¶ Proximate & selective mechanisms are discussed that allowed certain types of human depression to have evolved. Certain adult depressive patients, in losing situations, have an inability to "switch off" their submissive or yielding behavior with its concomitant cognitive & emotion components. Thus, although normal individuals accept defeat as an inevitable aspect of ritual agonistic encounters, certain depressed individuals do not. It is believed that the failure to terminate the yielding subroutine of ritual agonistic behavior (YS/RAB) is the proximate mechanism that underlies certain types of human depression. Also, through the selective mechanisms of difference amplification & kin selection, certain types of depressive illness may be adaptive to kin. Thus, selection could have operated at the family as well as the individual level, permitting certain types of depression to have evolved. The notion that depression is the result of selective mechanisms is supported by the prevalence of depression in human populations. 44 References. HA

¶ A discussion of the deinstitutionalization of the aged from state mental facilities, with focus on the extent to which nursing home care is substituted for psychiatric care. The number per capita of Medicaid program recipients of inpatient psychiatric care for each state in the period 1970-1982 was regressed on the number per capita of Medicaid nursing home recipients, number of nursing home beds per capita, & % aged. As expected, psychiatric care is negatively related to bed supply, & positively related to nursing home recipients & to % aged; the relationship to nursing home recipients is stronger in states with undersupplies of beds. These findings are interpreted to show that nursing home care is substituted for inpatient psychiatric care, depending on bed supply, the generosity of the Medicaid program, & the level of demand for care. 6 Tables. 55 References. Data from a longitudinal study of substance use among 2,500 students aged 11-14 in 10 schools in Mass & Calif are used to assess attrition bias. Questionnaires with self-generated identification codes were utilized to assure R anonymity. Cases were matched across 4 waves by a computer program designed to take account of the self-generated code & other stable personal variables. Results indicate that the bias that attrition introduces may not be deemed excessive if compared with the loss due to initial refusal to participate in identified tracking that has been observed by other investigators. A number of studies dealing with the relationship between life events & the course of the addiction process are reviewed. It is concluded that the general absence of theoretical development makes it difficult to draw unambiguous conclusions from these studies; reported associations between certain variables can only be viewed as ex post facto support for some version of a life events theory. Additional methodological problems are explored, including problems with retrospective recall, the "search for meaning," & the treatment of events as independent entities. It is suggested that future research must take into account the dynamic & structural aspects of life courses & the addiction process as well as pursue a more rigorous line of theoretical development & refinement. Based on questionnaire & inventory data & observations of couples' problem-solving interactions, relationship distress in 26 couples with alcoholic husbands, & 26 maritally conflicted & 26 nonconflicted couples without alcohol problems in Brockton, Mass, & San Diego, Calif, were compared. As predicted, the alcoholic & maritally conflicted couples did not differ, & both groups of problem couples showed greater relationship distress than nonconflicted couples on measures of marital stability, change desired, & positive communication behaviors. Contrary to predictions, alcoholic couples were not unique with respect to struggles for control, a pattern of wife dominance, a responsibility-avoiding style of communication by the alcoholic husband, or impaired perceptual accuracy. Unexpectedly, alcoholic husbands reported less marital unhappiness than both their wives & maritally conflicted husbands on most of the self-report marital satisfaction measures. 3 Tables, 3 Figures, 41 References. * Analysis of 1978 interview data from 1,109 drinkers who participated in a survey of 1,367 employed adults in Detroit, Mich., indicates that frequency of intoxication is associated with masculine self-orientation among men & feminine self-orientation among women during alcohol use. Attention is called to the importance of fathers' drinking, life events, SC relations, & a generalized alienation from self, work, & society for understanding alcohol use. A path analysis suggests that men & women who become intoxicated may regain a sense of self & relationships to others that they do not have in sober everyday life. ¶ During the academic year 1983/84, a questionnaire survey on drug consumption was conducted among 2,308 medical students in Barcelona, Spain. Results reveal a high proportion of smokers in both sexes. Alcohol consumption was 4 times higher among men than women, high proof beverages were becoming the most common drinks. Coffee was consumed by almost all Rs. Although cannabis derivatives had been tried at least once by most Rs, regular consumers were virtually nonexistent. Amphetamine consumption was restricted to examination periods. The use of opiates, cocaine, hallucinogens, & solvents was rare. ¶ The emergence of legislation enabling compulsory treatment of alcoholics in Sweden & Finland is examined, comparing the statutes themselves, the preparatory documents, & instructions on their implementation. Both countries introduced legal coercion as a method of dealing with alcoholics, which could mean close supervision or even compulsory commitment to an institution for a year or longer. In both countries, decisions about coercion are not made in regular courts, but either by a local board or by the county government. In Sweden, however, the local body in charge is the temperance board, while in Finland, it is the welfare board. Finland's temperance boards were too strongly identified with policing until prohibition was repealed, Sweden's temperance boards are less drastic. 2 Tables, 43 References. Modified AA

¶ GB's 1983 "Christmas Crusade" against drunken drivers, during which the police of England & Wales administered an average of 1,350 breath tests daily, is discussed. To test the hypothesis that the crusade reduced drunken driving, the index of total automobile crash-related fatalities, based on Dept of Transport statistics for 1977-1984, was examined. Results showed that the index declined significantly during the month of the crusade, providing support for the hypothesis of deterrent effect. The experience of the Christmas Crusade reinforces the expectation that deterrent interventions involving highly publicized campaigns increasing the certainty of punishment for illegal behavior can be successful over a limited period of time. 1 Table, 4 References. ¶ An emerging methodology, the dichotomous response model (eg, see Finney, D J, Probit Analysis, 3rd edition, New York: Cambridge U Press, 1971), is applied to alcohol abuse. The model permits the systematic integration of events & factors from various theories of alcohol abuse as well as random influences to affect the outcome. Both the sociological & distribution of consumption hypotheses are drawn on to specify the factors influencing alcohol abuse. An analysis of state-level statistical data from the US for 1968-1977 indicate that ethnic & stress factors strongly influence alcohol abuse. The stress variables include the rates of unemployment & divorce. The ethnic variables are the % of the population that are of African, French, Italian, & Mexican ancestry. Distribution variables such as price, income, & control measures are generally less important. 4 Tables, 19 References. Modified HA

Data were obtained from a sample of 185 students at Texas Tech U who completed a background information form & questionnaires related to alcohol use, family functioning, interpersonal relations, personality, & sex-role orientation. Results indicate that, as expected, an accumulation of family stresses was related to alcohol abuse scores for both Ms & Fs. ¶ The first systematic test is attempted of Robert Bales's theory ("Cultural Differences in Rates of Alcoholism," Quarterly Journal of Studies in Alcohol, 1946, 6, 482-498) that alcohol abuse is a result of socially induced stress & tension combined with a normative system that promotes the use of alcohol to release that tension. State-level statistical data are used to assess the impact of a measure of life stress on 6 measures of alcohol problems for 4 subgroups of states differentiated by proscriptiveness of alcohol use norms, 5 of the measures were best correlated with stress in states with norms favoring alcohol use. For 3 arrest variables, a curvilinear pattern was found in which the next highest r occurred in strongly proscriptive states. These data generally support Bales's hypothesis; two alternative explanations, based on social control & ambivalence hypotheses, are suggested for the curvilinear pattern. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 22 References. ¶ The changing distribution among various authorities in the management of alcohol problems in Finland from 1960 to 1980 is analyzed as an indicator of changes in the structure of the state apparatus. Although the total number of persons staying overnight for alcohol-related reasons in various institutions remained the same from 1960 to 1970, in 1960, prisons & jails accounted for 74% of the institutionalizations, while social institutions & mental & general hospitals accounted for 20% & 6%, respectively; however, in 1970, prisons & jails accounted for only 22% & in 1980, for less than 20%. During the 1970s, the role of social authorities was strengthened not only at the expense of the police but also in relation to medical authorities. Thus, in Finland, alcohol problems have not been turned into a medical issue to the same extent as, eg, in the US or in GB. 1 Table, 4 References. Modified AA

Personal Drinking Study questionnaire, a locus of control scale, & the revised UCLA (U of California, Los Angeles) loneliness scale, & also kept daily records of their experiences with alcohol & other drugs for a 3-week period. Results indicate that loneliness was strongly correlated to measures of alcohol problems when level of consumption was controlled. It was not strongly related to retrospective & self-monitoring measures of alcohol consumption or to most alcohol-related social variables. Both loneliness & alcohol problems were related to an external locus of control over personal consequences & impulses. Loneliness is discussed as a source of differential vulnerability to alcohol problems among relatively heavy drinkers. 2 Tables, 21 References. Modified HA

Seller, Sheldon C. (Dept Sociology Queens Coll, Flushing NY 11367), Alcohol Abuse in the New Testament, Alcohol and Alcoholism, 1987, 22, 1, 83-90

¶ The New Testament is similar to the Old Testament in terms of some fundamental attitudes toward alcohol. St. Paul, for example, in the spirit of the Old Testament, unequivocally condemns drunkenness but recommends the consumption of wine in moderate amounts. Nevertheless, there are significant differences in emphasis between the two documents: wine is referred to as God's gift in six of the books from the Old Testament, while no such description is offered in the New Testament. Also, total abstinence seems acceptable only under exceptional circumstances in the Old Testament, while it is implicitly extolled through the exemplary role of John the Baptist in the New Testament. Finally, penalties for drunkards, including loss of salvation, are proportionally more frequent & comprehensive in the New Testament. HA

¶ While the referral processes in management-based employee assistance/industrial alcoholism programs have been studied, little attention has been paid to those in union peer counseling programs. Data collected through participant observation, document analysis, & interviews (N not provided) are used to provide an ethnographic analysis of such a program at the Tunnel & Construction Workers Union in New York City, NY. In an occupational community characterized by a heavy drinking culture, the program consists of credentialed alcoholism counselors & a network of union members who also belong to Alcoholics Anonymous. Ways that problem drinkers are identified & motivated to change their behavior are examined. Constructive confrontation & job performance are crucial elements in these negotiations, though they take on slightly different meanings in unions than in management-dominated work organizations due to differences in social context. 77 References. Surbey, Michele K. (Dept Psychology McMaster U, Hamilton Ontario L8S 4K1), Anorexia Nervosa, Amenorrhea, and Adaptation, Ethology and Sociobiology, 1987, 8, 3(supplement), 47S-61S

¶ F mammals under stress or in poor physical condition often delay puberty or otherwise suppress reproduction. This capacity is adaptive because it enables Fs to avoid reproduction when environmental conditions are not conducive to the survival of offspring. Because amenorrhea is one of the key diagnostic criteria for this condition, anorexia nervosa is discussed in an evolutionary context. It is suggested that anorexia nervosa may delay puberty in girls who are disposed to early maturity. Since there is some evidence that early & late maturers have different life histories in modern societies, the reproductive delay associated with anorexia nervosa exhibits features compatible with an evolved reproductive strategy. Insofar as anorexia nervosa is a modern phenomenon, it is unlikely that the syndrome per se is the result of selection. Rather, anorexia nervosa appears to be a reflection of the F ability to alter maturation rates & reproductive function in response to environmental conditions. 86 References. HA

† Despite the expansion of community-based service alternatives, demand for case-coordinated community care for the elderly continues to rise. Many programs, under pressure to target their services to the most disabled, have developed comprehensive entry criteria to determine eligibility. While these criteria generally require an in-person assessment to make the determination, the volume of potential applicants makes such assessment impractical. Here, a screening method used in a ten-state channeling demonstration conducted between 1981 & 1985 is described that employed a telephone screen prior to an in-person assessment. Results of the data collection methods are compared, & implications for the use of such a screening instrument prior to formal assessment for long-term care are discussed. 4 Tables, 3 References. † Difficulty in adjusting to retirement has consistently emerged as a problem for approximately 33% of retirees. A review of empirical research shows the poor adjuster to be in poor health, with inadequate income & a negative preretirement attitude. Findings relating to other factors such as SES, occupation, activity, career fulfillment, job satisfaction, & work commitment are far less conclusive, with interpretation hampered by a failure to control for the more well established correlates of retirement adjustment. The goal hierarchy model & the political economy of old age literature are evaluated as bases for explaining differences in retirement adjustment, & a theoretical framework for future research that brings these two perspectives together is proposed. with focus on their meaning & relevance for Jewish elderly, a group that is growing more rapidly than the general population. It is shown how patterns of aging vary in relation to the elderly's specific historical context, current SES, & health practices. The three concepts are juxtaposed to develop a working construct that blends some of their common features & allows for an analysis of the developmental crises, life transitions, & crises confronting the elderly at different stages. Major filial crises that may bring the elderly to the attention of counseling services are explored. It is argued that lifelong learning is necessary for helping the elderly cope with the stress of rapid technological & cultural innovation. Volunteerism alone has not been found to be associated with increased life satisfaction, & programs oriented more to self-help are encouraged. 28 References. K Hyatt

* Rapid industrialization in the People's Republic of China (PRC) since the late 1970s offers a unique opportunity to explore the relation between the political economy & the social support systems for the growing proportion of the elderly. Four categories of aged are identified on the basis of economic support, & three support networks: social units, the social welfare system, & institutional supports that provide assistance to the aged are examined. Analysis reveals that the future of the elderly in the PRC will be greatly influenced by (1) the political agenda, (2) the degree to which traditional values toward the aged are preserved, (3) the degree to which the elder care support system continues to be built on the existing social structure, (4) the degree to which the elder care program becomes institutionalized in the state budget, & (5) the degree to which the elderly continue to be integrated into society. 1 Figure, 82 References. * Intensive interviews with 40 women who had relocated to facilities for the elderly reveal substantial variations in experiences of relocation along SES lines. Most women were likely to have moved from homes that they had owned & lived in for many years. Having strong attachments to place, they coped with relocation by making their new rooms into museums of their lives. Low women were likely to have moved many times in their lives & were unlikely to have owned their own homes. Moving into a facility for the elderly was experienced as one in a long succession of moves, distinguished only by increased comfort & security. Most women were likely to begin a downward spiral after widowhood or divorce. Moving into a facility for the elderly stopped the succession of moves to progressively smaller & less comfortable residences. 18 References. HA

* Evidence is presented suggesting that gradual social change is occurring within the Old Order Amish subculture, based on questionnaire data from 106 families in 6 communities: Berne & Milroy, Ind; Kalona, Iowa; Plain City, Ohio; Ethridge, Tenn; & Intercourse, Pa. Social change is investigated in each major social institution that impacts on Amish life. The Amish social system is examined from a structural-functional viewpoint. The findings suggest that the Amish are accepting (modest) acculturation—particularly in their work & their search for economic survival. The Old Order Amish are not victims of "future shock," but their independence is being threatened by modern social forces that they cannot always control. 21 References. Modified AA

* Since Americans are surviving to the extremes of old age in unprecedented numbers, long-term care is likely to be a critical policy issue in the future. The conditions under which managers in public long-term care programs believe that family & friends can assume responsibility for the long-term care of the elderly are examined on the basis of 1985 interview data from 95 case managers & 32 case management supervisors in Wash & Ore. A factor analysis of 13 individual items reveals 5 broad dimensions of importance in care plan development: (1) size of responsibility, (2) caregivers' capacity, (3) long-range welfare, (4) caregivers' age, & (5) caregivers' motivation. Of these conditions, the size of the caregiving responsibility was rated the highest in importance in assessing family responsibility. 3 Tables, 28 References. Modified HA

* Based on a review of gerontological studies conducted in Poland over the last twenty years, a number of changes in the SE circumstances of the elderly population are outlined. The impact of demographic factors is examined, with particular emphasis on post-WWII migrations & the more recent Ru-Ur movements, & trends in health & functional status are described. It is shown that self-assessed health & even life expectancy have decreased over the last five years, & a number of explanations are suggested. Data from national surveys conducted in the 1960s & 1980s are compared to identify changes in the family situation of the elderly. Despite an overall reduction in many forms of family support, it is shown that help from parents & children has increased, particularly over the last five years. It is concluded that while various services need to be developed along Western lines, this development should be accompanied by a strengthening of various forms of family care. 13 Tables. HA

* Changes in the care of elderly people in Belgium & their relationships with their children between 1965 & 1985 are explored using interview data ($\Sigma N = 4,106$) from the Centrum voor Bevolkings- en Gezinsstudien. An increased tendency for the elderly to perform their own housekeeping is observed, though help in extraordinary situations, eg, sickness or disability, is still obtained from others, generally family or friends rather than professionals. Though the number of intergenerational households has decreased, contact between generations remains high & is positively appreciated by the elderly. Further research is needed to determine if descendants view such contacts in a similarly positive light. 3 Tables, 33 References. Modified HA

ual life histories are constructed for a sample of 87 persons aged 70+, which reveal the isolation of this population. few old people lived with their married children, but either retained their own households once the children had moved, or relocated to smaller lodgings on their own. ¶ The results of an interview survey of 159 elderly people living in an urban community are discussed. The majority of Rs were elderly women living alone. These Rs expressed considerable anxiety about crime. The amount of crime & the type of crime they experienced took place in the domestic environment, reasons for this are discussed from the perspectives of victimology & gerontology. It is suggested that elderly women experience particular difficulties in controlling their domestic space & that crime prevention strategies need to consider this carefully. 2 Tables, 20 References. ¶ The time allocations of 525 Rs aged 65+ in 4 different types of living situations were studied based on interviews & time budgets. The strongest determinant of time allocation, beyond basic demographic characteristics, was functional health, which was better among people spending time in obligatory activities, both alone & outside the home. Cognitive competence was associated with media use, time alone, amount of rest, time with family, & time in the home. More time was spent in most-liked discretionary, not obligatory, activities. Specifically, the more time one spent interacting with friends, with household family, reading, watching TV, engaging in recreation, & being in the yard, the more each of these activities was liked. While there was a strong relationship between degree of liking for most activities & personal adjustment, the actual distribution of time among the activities was quite independent of personal adjustment, with the exception of time alone, which showed a slight negative association with personal adjustment. 4 Tables, 1 Figure, 14 References. ¶ It is argued that men commonly deal with the changes precipitated by retirement by emphasizing those aspects of their lives that represent continuity. Semistructured interview data obtained from a sample of 105 Ms in Edinburgh, Scotland, before & after they retired at age 65 indicate that, far from taking up a set of new activities, retirement is usually characterized by continuity in leisure pursuits, although their significance may change in retirement. The psychological values, use of time, & social contact associated with leisure in this period of transition are appraised, & it is concluded that many of those who adapt best to retirement are those who in fact make the fewest changes. 3 Tables, 13 References. ¶ After reviewing some social scientific research in the emerging field of person-object relations, three research objectives that emerge for gerontology are discussed: how the elderly use personal possessions (object (1) for mnemonic (memory-enhancing) purposes, (2) to negotiate transitions in self & status definition, & (3) as instruments of cross-generational influence. Practical implications of each question are noted & ethnographic substance is added to theoretical considerations using illustrative material from an ongoing research project involving qualitative interviews with 40 adults in southern Ontario segmented by age & occupation. Preliminary results are discussed in terms of how the elderly use consumer goods & consumption activities as sources of cultural meaning & manipulate this meaning to accomplish certain kinds of social & cultural work. ¶ Based on fieldwork conducted between 1982 & 1984 in a Ru GB village, a model is constructed of nonkin community assistance to the elderly. Such care is shown to be a social relationship shaped by the community's code of values, elderly's communication of need, & the agreement between these factors. A case study is used to show how communication failures can disrupt this relationship: a misinterpretation of the elderly's needs can result in inappropriate or inadequate care, while the elderly person's misinterpretation of care that is offered or failure to adequately communicate their needs can cause them to be rejected or labeled deviant. ¶ Crime & economic development are discussed as part of a major human adaptation to a new form of civilized life, ie, urbanization, technology, & industrialization. Within this paradigm, the process of economic development is viewed in stages, & clusters of social, cultural, & historical circumstances distinctive of specific developmental stages, or criminogenic contexts, are examined. Two such contexts are described: the first is a product of the unplanned drift of Ru populations to Ur areas in search of a better life, the second is a product of the changeover of elite groups in societies seeking to make the transition to modernization & sustained economic growth. Policy options in the interests of minimizing crime in the developmental process are briefly considered. Modified HA

In recent years, progress has been made to reverse this abuse, as reflected by tremendous growth in the number of state laws & programs designed to assist victims. At home, in school, in religious institutions, & in the community, values must be affirmed that best prevent crime. It must be remembered that law & its enforcement play a vital role in the inculcation of respect for human life & dignity. HA

¶ An evaluation of 97 potential risk markers of husband to wife violence. Using 52 case-comparison studies from the published literature as the source of data, markers were divided into 4 categories: consistent risk, inconsistent risk, consistent nonrisk, & risk markers with insufficient data. Based on this classification, it appears that a number of widely held hypotheses about husband to wife violence have little empirical support. Only witnessing violence in the wife's family of origin was consistently associated with being victimized by violence. Furthermore, it seems that characteristics associated with either the husband-offender or the couple have greater utility for assessing the risk of husband to wife violence than characteristics of the wife-victim. Findings are discussed in terms of the methodological & theoretical implications of current research on this form of adult domestic violence. 4 Tables, 95 References. Modified HA

stein, Crime and Human Nature (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1985 (see listing in IRPS No 42)). The highly favorable media attention this work has received is discussed in terms of the appeal of the book's political agenda, ie, a conservative & populist approach to criminology. Wilson's & Herrnstein's biological & deterministic views of criminality are challenged, & the methodology of the studies cited as evidence is questioned. It is argued that "crime" is a highly subjective & flexible concept that depends on social & political realities, which are customarily ignored by biocriminological studies. Crime and Human Nature is also criticized for its selective definition of criminality, viewed as only 1c crime, to the neglect of corporate & white-collar offenses. The results are consistent with the hypotheses & suggest the following generalizations: (1) activities that involve the mutual pursuit of fun are more victimogenic than activities that passively put people at risk, (2) delinquent activity is positively & more strongly related to victimization than nondelinquent activities, & (3) gender differences in victimization are reduced considerably by controls for delinquent activity. While offensive activity cannot be demonstrated to precede victimization using cross-sectional data, the results do demonstrate the potential importance of delinquent activity in explanations of victimization among youths. 7 Tables, 30 References. ¶ A geostatistical technique: centrography is described, & ways that it can enhance the spatial-temporal analysis of crime are examined. It is shown how centrography can permit the assessment & measurement of the geographic distribution of criminal activity through time, including its average location, dispersion, momentum, & directional change. The technique is demonstrated using a spatial data set of crime scene locations for all lone-assault rapes & attempted rapes reported to the police in San Diego, Calif, between 1971 & 1975 (N = 612). Results indicate that spatial patterns vary for different types of offenders & over time. 4 Tables, 2 Figures. 35 References. K Hyatt

¶ An examination of the excess F mortality (EFM) hypothesis (Cordes C, "Infanticide," APA Monitor, 1982, Dec, 14-15) & differential gender mortality by filicide/infanticide attempts within a Canadian context. From 1976 to 1984, 15 women were admitted to a medium-security forensic psychiatric service for assessment or treatment in conjunction with murder/attempted murder of their biological children. 12 of the women were born in Canada, while 3 were immigrants from less industrialized countries. Analysis of hospital records reveal that M children were 2.5 times more likely to be killed than Fs, in children under age 2, the M-F infanticide ratio was 3:1. When maternal cultural background was examined, nonimmigrant women exclusively killed M children under age 2, while immigrant women exclusively killed F children under age 2. Thus, the EFM hypothesis received support only for immigrant women. 1 Table, 9 References. AA

¶ A review essay on a book edited by Robert H. Binstock & Ethel Shanas, Handbook of Aging and the Social Sciences, second edition (New York: Van Nostrand Reinhold, 1985 [see listing in IRPS No. 42]). This work is designed to serve as a primary reference manual for students of gerontology, & covers five broad subject areas: the study of aging, social aspects of aging, & aging as related to social structure, social systems, & social interventions. It is argued that, though comprehensive, the volume has significant limitations in that it is too advanced for an introductory text & is biased toward a US-centered assessment of aging & the social sciences. Its revelations about the current state of gerontological research in the US are discussed, with focus on its limited variety of theoretical perspectives, failure to develop macrolevel approaches to aging, & subordination of social policy to social theory. ¶ Research aimed at clarifying the problem of dependent populations, or the benefit of policymakers in advanced countries has been hampered by the lack of attempts to define & classify dependency. Presented here is a general definition of dependency, together with a classification system based on assistance needs & the sources of these needs. Existing measures apply only to a limited range of problems within this classification scheme. ¶ There has been considerable research on cross-national variation in level of social security program development, but little on the link between social security development & social welfare outputs such as physical quality of life. There is much debate as to whether any independent effect remains once differences in level of development are taken into consideration. Hypotheses derived from several general theories of inequality & welfare state development are tested using data from a 1975 cross-sectional sample of 80 developing nations & a pooled sample for 1970 & 1975. Strong support is found for hypotheses derived from industrialism theory & demographic modernization theory. In addition, support is found for hypotheses derived from dependency theory & ethnic conflict theory, & for some effect for social security spending. There is no support for hypotheses derived from democratic theory or SC (We strengthen) theory. 4 Tables, 1 Appendix, 68 References. HA

¶ A retrospective study of homicide victims in Erie County, NY, was conducted for 1973-1984 to determine the association of blood alcohol levels (BALs) among 631 homicide victims slain by guns & other weapons. Most victims of gunshot or beating had negative BALs at time of death, whereas most stabbing victims had positive BALs, especially black victims. Gunshot victims were more likely to be killed in a private home compared to a street or building. Location of homicide did not relate significantly to BAL. Younger victims were less likely to be shot to death compared to middle-aged victims. These results do not support previous contentions that alcohol is a major contributor to gun-related homicides. 1 Table, 9 References. HA

¶ A theoretical model is presented that integrates four macrosociological theories of rape: rape is a mechanism of gender inequality; (2) rape is attributed to the proliferation of pornographic materials; (3) cultural spillover theory, ie, cultural norms that favor violence for socially legitimate purposes tend to be generalized to other social contexts, eg, rape; & (4) social disorganization reduces social constraints against rape. The theoretical model is tested using 1980-1982 US police records on rapes. Results show that gender inequality, social disorganization, % of population residing in SMSAs, circulation of pornography, economic inequality, & % unemployed have direct effects on the incidence of rape. 2 Tables, 2 Figures, 1 Appendix, 102 References.

¶ Following the highly publicized New Bedford rape case, in which a young woman was raped by several men on a pool table in New Bedford Mass, on 6 Mar 1983, a segment of the local Portuguese community responded with great hostility to the rape victim & with sympathy for the rapists. The victim was blamed for the ethnic prejudice that erupted after the rape & culminated in the trial of six rapists in 1984. Newspaper accounts are used to analyze the Portuguese community's response, particularly the negative reactions of Portuguese women to another Portuguese woman who had been raped, & the conflict that developed between ethnic & sexual forms of prejudice is discussed. 48 References. ¶ A discussion of the morality of radical or critical criminology, focusing on the moral dimension of crime & punishment. Radical criminology & critical legal studies seem to have become ambivalent in their positions on crime & punishment. Questions concerning the moral evaluation of behavior, the fair allocation of blame, & the infliction of a just measure of pain have been neglected, obscured, or evaded. International Journal of Offender Therapy and Comparative Criminology, 1986, 30, 3, Dec, 203-211.

¶ A consideration of economic situation & actual goods stolen was used to divide 101 shoplifters referred for psychological assessment through probation services in the metropolitan Toronto, Ontario, area into 3 categories: shoplifting for profit or gain & 2 levels of "non-sensical" shoplifting, i.e. shoplifting not apparently motivated by need or desire. Using data from interviews & probation records, the groups were compared on demographic & relevant background information, psychosocial stressors preceding the offense, & general psychological profile. The non-sensical shoplifter was more likely to be older, married, foreign-born, adopted, to have experienced an unusual childhood stress, & to be depressed & socially isolated in comparison to other shoplifters. Shoplifters in general were more likely to be F than M. An explanation in terms of an accumulation of stressors over time in certain individuals was offered as one interpretation of the findings. 1 Table, 11 References. Modified HA

¶ A discussion of the shift by social scientists from an age status to an age stratification perspective on human aging. The history & major proponents of the age stratification model are discussed, its widespread adoption attributed to its highlighting the variable of age & to the rise of conflict theory, bureaucracy, & the theorized diminished importance of the family. The model is inaccurate because it conflates age with class stratification & treats the life course as a vertical hierarchy rather than a horizontal progression. Social policies based on age stratification theory may inadequately provide for vulnerable or disadvantaged children or elderly persons. It is suggested that, instead of seeking standardized treatment among age groups, social policies should promote fairness & equity. 34 References. HA

¶ Participatory action research (PAR), a methodology that combines theory, action, & participation committed to further the interests of exploited groups & classes, has been tried in many Third World countries since the 1970s. PAR claims inspiration from phenomenological & Marxist trends adjusted to regional realities & factors; it challenges established academic routines without discarding the need to accumulate & systematize knowledge, & to construct a more comprehensive & human paradigm in the social sciences; & it proposes a series of techniques to combine knowledge & power without falling into the dangers of world annihilation. This approach is illustrated with descriptions of actual field studies & projects in Nicaragua, Colombia, & Mexico. 1 Bibliography, 21 References. HA

Applied sociology differs from academic sociology in the US not only in content but also in its practical orientation toward solving particular problems. ¶ An analysis of some of the characteristics of homicide victimizations in Canadian federal correctional institutions. Two historical periods are compared 1967-1968 (N = 32), & 1979-1984 (N = 52). The findings suggest the incidence of prison homicides has increased over the years, & the character of victims & victimizations has changed. More recent prison homicides were more likely to have been carried out by multiple assailants, were more commonly associated with revenge motives or drug & gambling debts, & involved victims more likely to have violent backgrounds. ¶ Although the political leaders in the GDR have not been willing to set aside Marxist-Leninist theory on criminality, the reality of social life & human nature has forced them to slowly yield to a more adequate view. Ideology still keeps criminology bound in the GDR, but for the last ten years the influence of this & other sciences has been growing. People in the GDR are thoroughly convinced that belief that "something will work" in itself stimulates & inspires those striving for a reduction of criminality. This is not a plea to follow a utopian theory, but to make Western criminology free of a negative outlook that seems to prevent the development of more positively oriented theories that might prove what can work. 1 Table, 20 References. ¶ Interprofessional consensus in seriousness ratings of child maltreatment incidents was examined by surveying ratings of 39 case vignettes by 295 pediatric hospital professionals from 5 occupations. The survey instrument was derived from research by J. M. Giovannoni & R. M. Becerra (Defining Child Abuse, New York: Free Press, 1979). An exploratory factor analysis yielded 5 categories of maltreatment: physical abuse, sexual abuse, general failures in care, minor neglect/discipline, & lifestyles/values. A sixth category, parental sexual preference, was rated not very serious & did not appear to belong in the maltreatment domain. Nurses & social workers rated incidents as most serious, differing significantly from psychiatrists &, often, from MDs & psychologists. Professions agreed on rank ordering of categories by seriousness. Variables such as sex, parenthood status, years of experience, & medical specialty showed some relationship to ratings within some professional groups. 8 Tables, 23 References. Modified HA

¶ Telephone interview data from 498 residents of Calgary, Alberta, are used to develop & test a multivariate model of punitive attitudes toward criminal offenders. While those with accurate information about the prevalence of violent crime in Canadian society tend to favor less severe sentencing, the only factor that substantially affects the degree of punitiveness expressed is whether the crime is violent or not. While those individuals with accurate information about violent crime were significantly less fearful, lower fear levels were not translated into less punitive attitudes. Rs attributed a far higher level of harm to violent acts, suggesting that their punitive attitudes are rooted in their perception of violent crimes as far more serious than property crimes. 5 Tables, 33 References. A case study of a Chicago, Ill, Chicano community, based on participant observation, shows that gang members are not outsiders but are members of family networks in which they behave appropriately. It is also shown that tolerance varies in degree & may be fragile, but that it is generally maintained through active negotiation between community residents & gang members. Locally, the meaning of gang violence is articulated within the cultural framework of honor that allows residents to understand, if not approve of, gang violence. However, this precarious negotiated order collapses, & intolerance results, when violent confrontations disrupt community affairs, such as dances or weddings, or when families become implicated in their sons' violent activities. 29 References. † The forensic psychiatric files of 27 adolescent delinquents mainly charged with serious criminality were retrospectively evaluated by a forensic psychiatrist & an adolescent psychiatric group, criminological, social, educational, & psychological/psychiatric data were rated. The adolescent psychiatric group reevaluated the diagnoses using a broader borderline concept, particularly suited for adolescents, than that used by the forensic psychiatrist. In many respects the social background of the juvenile delinquents did not differ from nondelinquents, but a very high % of the delinquents have had psychological/psychiatric symptoms from early childhood. School problems & alcohol abuse were frequently seen. The adolescent psychiatric group diagnosed 9 cases of borderline conditions against 2 diagnosed by the forensic psychiatrist. While the need for treatment is obvious, it is very difficult to place young offenders within the present treatment system in Denmark, consequently, such offenders are often placed in barely custodial institutions. 4 Tables, 31 References. † The northern School-Juvenile Court Liaison Project, designed to assist schools & courts in working cooperatively to intervene in, & prevent, delinquency, is evaluated, based on questionnaire data gathered from project social workers (N = 5) regarding the actions of each system in 120 referral cases. Results indicate increased communication & joint service planning between the systems. School & court personnel are talking to each other more often about students who are involved with the court, as well as about general issues of school-court cooperation, & school & court staff are working together more frequently to develop treatment plans for such students. School-court teams have also been successful in developing interagency case staffing councils & prevention-oriented projects in their communities. Factors contributing to the project's success are discussed. 4 Tables, 16 References. Modified HA

† Studies of the relationship between race & delinquency have typically found that broken homes lead to greater delinquency among blacks than among whites, but have not demonstrated empirically why this is so. Theoretical mechanisms are derived from differential association theory & social control theory, specifying how broken homes may influence delinquency among both blacks & nonblacks. The analysis specifies a structural equation model of delinquency (Matsueda, Ross L., see SA 30:5/82M6804) derives competing hypotheses from the two theories, & estimates a cross-population model for 1,001 blacks & 1,588 nonblacks using data from Alan B. Wilson's Richmond Youth Project (Berkeley, U of California, 1965). Consistent with previous research, it is found that broken homes have a larger impact on delinquency among blacks than nonblacks, but, unlike previous studies, the model explains this effect

¶ The case of human services reform in Kalamazoo County, Mich, in 1983, is used to exemplify the problem of duplication ie, a variety of agencies serving the same clients inherent in the integration of human services. A brief history of services integration is given, noting Nixon administration efforts to avoid duplication, increase service accessibility, & reduce the cost of services; however, the federal government's choice to fund by category of service results in duplication. Kalamazoo County's evolutionary approach to avoid duplication includes: the establishment of one management structure to cut across service categories, staff & board involvement, careful planning, the participation of staff & citizen boards, the educational programs, & a view of services integration as a social process. 2 Figures. ¶ Since the publication of the Manual for the Child Behavior Checklist (Achenbach, T. & Edelbrock, C., Burlington U of Vermont, 1983), this checklist has been presented as an assessment tool helpful in distinguishing delinquency & emotional disturbance. An investigation is conducted to determine: (1) the capacity of this scale to profile the behavior of adolescent offenders, & (2) the relationship between the security of an individual's placement & the severity of their behavior. Statistical analysis of behavioral ratings completed on 244 M juvenile offenders committed to state residential facilities indicate that the checklist is successful in identifying behaviorally different subgroups of delinquent youth. The severity scores are not effective, however, in differentiating the level of security to which offenders are classified. The results are discussed in relation to both the treatment of individual youth & the adequacy of an agency's classification system. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 13 References. Modified HA

¶ A demonstration of the utility of latent structure analysis for two aspects of the problem of measuring delinquency. (1) the selection of a set of behaviors that can be regarded as delinquency indicators, & (2) the definition of decision rules for developing a qualitative measure that describes individual acts in terms consistent with the delinquency concept. After summarizing previous techniques used to measure delinquency, the latent structure model is described & applied to a set of 6 self-reported delinquency items (obtained from the Seattle Youth Study, see Hinde-lang, M. J., Hirschi, T., Weis, J. G., Measuring Delinquency, Beverly Hills, Calif. Sage, 1981) to create a single salient variable: delinquency—that can be subdivided into three classes by degree of severity. Assessment of the external validity of the latent structure method reveals that it provides for a considerably greater association between exogenous variables frequently correlated with delinquency than when the more common additive method is used, & may thus increase the explanatory power of existing independent variables. Suggestions for the use of latent structure analysis for research on other criminological issues are provided. 5 Tables, 1 Figure, 27 References. K Hyatt

¶ Material obtained from a 1979-1981 participant observational study of New York City girl gang members is used to examine how their structural position as poor, Puerto Rican, & F affects their self-presentation in social talk. Much of their sense of individuality results from their rejection of aspects of identity associated with that social position. Their self-definition is realized not through the construction of a fully integrated deviant personality, but through piecemeal rejection of various components of stereotypes about poor, Puerto Rican women. It is suggested that closer examination of gossip & "put downs" can illuminate how personal identity is constructed through the vilification of others' actions & character. 38 References. ¶ From 1981 to 1986, a federally sponsored research & development program to prevent violent juvenile crime was implemented through neighborhood-based organizations in the Bronx, NY, Chicago, Ill, Dallas Tex, New Orleans, La, & Los Angeles & San Diego, Calif. Its goal was to reduce such crime in specific locations through resident mobilization to strengthen neighborhood cohesion & make local institutions more responsive. A conceptual framework was based on social control & learning theories. Each local version of the program involved an ongoing needs assessment through which neighborhood resident councils planned & revised their efforts, each was required to include violent crisis intervention, mediation, family support networking, & youth skills development. After 36 months of planning & implementation, data from police reports, self-report surveys of crime by neighborhood youth, & household victimization surveys (N not given) indicate that serious juvenile crime decreased in 3 of the 6 target neighborhoods, compared to their respective cities. Most of the programs developed means of financial support to carry on all or part of the effort after federal funding ended. Community-led programs that emphasize advocacy & institutional mediation appear to be more effective than traditional social services in mobilizing residents to prevent juvenile crime & violence. 1 Table, 2 Figures. Love deprivation & P > V discrepancy were significantly related to violent delinquency after adjusting for the effects of both race & SC, two variables often closely associated with violent delinquency. Also, love deprivation was strongly related to P > V discrepancy. It was speculated that high performance

Comment, 141-149. Reply, 150

† Delinquent gangs are not unique to large Ur areas, but are now reported in a significant number of small-sized cities & towns in the US. Community perceptions of & reactions to gang delinquency in Racine, Wisc, are investigated using data from a survey administered in various public places to 543 adults. Demographic characteristics of Rs are related to their attitudes toward youth & youth gangs, their experience with gang activities, & their perceptions of typical gang members. Results have important implications for the development of local policies & programs to combat youth gang delinquency in smaller cities. In Follow Up: Law-Violating Youth Groups in Wisconsin, Ronald J. Berger (U of Wisconsin, Whitewater) suggests that increased attention be devoted to adolescent subcultures in general, not only delinquent gangs. Using data from U students' (N not provided) autobiographical accounts of their personal involvement in delinquent & nondelinquent groups, some of the informal law-violating youth groups that are prevalent in Wisc are identified & their characteristics discussed. Further research into the postadolescent criminal careers of these group members is suggested. In Youth Gangs in Wisconsin: An Official View, Richard G. Salem (U of Wisconsin, Whitewater) uses interview data from 3 public officials involved with youth programs & juvenile corrections to explore current efforts to deal with the problem of youth gangs. In Comments and Critique, Martin Gruberg (U of Wisconsin, Oshkosh) points out some flaws in Takata's & Zevitz's community survey, in particular, the accuracy of Rs's perceptions is questioned. Joan Moore (U of Wisconsin, Milwaukee) asserts that public reactions to youth gangs is often confused by anxieties about the fate of the city in general, particularly the decline of its industrial base. Some media-based stereotypes of gangs are invalidated based on analysis of interview data from former founding members of 18 youth gangs in Milwaukee. In Response, Takata & Zevitz respond to each comment in turn, & reiterate that their study was an exploratory investigation of community perceptions regarding gangs, not an all-encompassing picture of the reality of this phenomenon. Case records from 131 M delinquents in Boise, Idaho, including Wechsler IQ scores, are used to examine the reasons for this phenomenon. It is found that P>V scores are significantly related to love deprivation & to violent crimes, & that much of their explanatory power with regard to violent crimes is mediated by love deprivation. SC, low verbal scores, & low full-scale scores do not explain P>V scores. Only love deprivation is significantly related to P>V scores, supporting the suggestion that early emotional stresses affect subsequent nervous system functioning. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 1 Appendix, 38 References. * A discussion of the relationship between reason, domination, & subjectivity in modern society. Shown is how T. W. Adorno & Max Horkheimer relied on Friedrich Nietzsche's Genealogy of Morals (English translation, 1956) in elaborating a dialectic of enlightenment in which reason is seen as undermining its own supposition of autonomy. It is argued that Foucault also drew from Nietzsche's thought, but in a more radical way. Foucault seeks to avoid the self-referential paradoxes of a totalizing critique of rationality that plagued first-generation critical theorists by developing a genealogical method that brackets any reference to reason & meaning. Also, Jürgen Habermas's hermeneutical critique of Foucault's method is examined. This perspective enables Habermas to construct a bilevel model of society as lifeworld & system, & therewith, an alternate conception of communicative rationality that allows him to avoid transcendental paradoxes & to explain social reification as a result of an overextended economic-administrative system. In the final analysis, both he & Foucault agree that the relationship between art & life is decisive for orienting critical social theory. AA

It is asserted that economic models are not universal but are based on cultural assumptions concerning factors such as competition, homogeneity, income distribution, mobility of variables, & ownership of resources. The current method of teaching economics in Africa is seen more as a form of acculturation than a useful educational process. Pepper, David (Geography Unit Faculty Environment Oxford Polytechnic, Headington OX3 0BP England), Physical and Human Integration: An Educational Perspective from British Higher Education. Progress in Human Geography, 1987, 11, 3, Sept, 380-404

* The question of whether physical & human geography should be treated as a unity or as discrete subjects in British higher education is discussed from two viewpoints: the political Right & Left. The educational deficiencies of physical geography stem from the deficiencies of science education in general, which include a neglect of communication & discussion skills, a lack of critical awareness of sociopolitical context, & a failure to examine the relevance of subject matter to social issues & social change. As such, physical geography education serves the interests of the Right more than the Left, though even the former have grounds for dissatisfaction in that employability skills are neglected. Even applied physical geography shows these deficiencies, because it is largely descriptive & taxonomic, & neglects to question how, & for what ultimate purpose, it is being applied. A more relevant & educationally satisfying physical geography from the viewpoints of both Left & Right—should stem from social issues & contexts. To make all physical geography relevant & applied in this way, it must be more closely integrated with human geography. 1 Table, 69 References. Modified AA Nederman, C. J. (Dept Political Science U Canterbury, Christchurch 1 New Zealand), Welfare or Warfare? Medieval Contributions, International Journal of Moral and Social Studies, 1986, 1, 3, autumn, 219-234.

¶ It is argued that the evaluation of the relationship between military expenditure & social welfare has received more adequate philosophical treatment by medieval theorists than by their twentieth-century counterparts. To demonstrate this claim, two political treatises written in England in the 1330s are considered, each of which develops a theoretical framework for analyzing the implications of governmental spending on armaments & armies for the condition of the poor. One work, the Speculum Regis Edwardi III (attributed to William of Pagula), maintains that the king's military policies are directly responsible for the suffering of the poor & charges him with redressing their grievances lest they rise against him on legitimate grounds. By contrast, William of Ockham's An princeps defends the position that in so far as the sine qua non of the common good is the defense of the kingdom, the welfare of the poor is necessarily subordinate to expenditure for military purposes. It is thus possible to identify within medieval political thought quite divergent views regarding the relative priorities to be accorded to welfare & warfare. In turn, it may be hoped that the ideas proposed by Pagula & Ockham will suggest to modern political philosophers some intellectual points of departure from which may emerge normative arguments about the manner in which contemporary governments allocate the scarce public resources available to them. 31 References. HA

¶ Classical Asian psychology is a vast source of significant knowledge, yet it continues to be generally unrecognized by US psychology. This neglect is attributed to: (1) the climate of scholarship in US psychology, (2) the reward system in contemporary higher education, (3) the continuing justification of psychology as a science, (4) misconceptions about the empirical nature of Asian psychology, & (5) different cultural values. It is concluded that responsible scholarship & scientific progress necessitate recognizing the existence & significance of Asian psychology. 7 References. Modified HA

¶ A discussion of the ideas of Jean-Paul Sartre, with particular reference to a number of Sartre's works that were published posthumously. The ongoing debate over the critique of dialectical reason is examined. Sartre's method of Marxist analysis in defining the relationship between man & his time is investigated. It is suggested that it was inspired by Henri Lefebvre's proposal for an analysis of Russian sociology ("Perspectives de sociologie rurale" (Perspectives of Rural Sociology), Cahiers, Paris: La Sociologie, 1953). Regressive & progressive elements in Sartre's method are discussed. C. Waters

¶ The environmental belief systems of elites & publics in Shizuoka Prefecture, Japan, & Spokane County, Wash, are compared in order to determine if the shared forces of postindustrialism generate similar belief structures among elites in nations with quite distinct cultural, political, & historical backgrounds. Twenty specific belief system elements related to natural resource/environmental policy & political/postindustrial values were investigated using mail questionnaire data collected in 1983/84 from samples of citizens, political activists, & political elites ($\Sigma N = 1,783$). Results indicate substantial differences between Japanese & US elites in the structuring of environmental beliefs, & a greater similarity between the beliefs of Japanese elites & public citizens than between US elites & publics. These differences are explained in terms of contemporary Japanese & US political & social cultures & their effects on the adoption of postindustrial values. 9 Tables, 43 References. Modified HA

¶ The quest for "alternative" science is a recurrent theme in the radical criticism of science. This approach seeks to recombine objective validity & moral responsibility within the concept of knowledge, & to dismantle the scientific standards that are at present institutionalized as a frame of reference for research & for society's relations with nature. The sociological implications of the perspective of alternative science are discussed & the feasibility of such a science is examined in light of recent research on ecosystems. Some ecologists are hopeful of a shift toward a normative knowledge of nature, but the problem of putting this new approach in operation via political/social mechanisms would remain. The healing of nature through scientific means is not in sight. 2 Tables, 86 References. Modified HA

Brunkhorst, Hauke (Dept Sociology & Pedagogics U Frankfurt, D-6000 Federal Republic Germany), Romanticism and Cultural Criticism, ♦ Praxis International, 1987, 6, 4, Jan, 397-415
Translated by John Cole.

¶ The internal relations of romanticism & rationality are clarified conceptually in an attempt to refute the widely accepted thesis that romanticism is irrationalism. Based on an examination of nineteenth-century romanticism in Germany, two versions of romanticism are distinguished, one of which is argued to be modern & rational in two ways: (1) the original romantic impulse is rational analogous to the sciences, though in other realms, it is radical & innovative, & (2) romanticism is one of the driving forces of social rationalization in its constitution of art & intimate relations as autonomous spheres of value. The paradoxes of romanticism are explained via a strategy that relates enlightenment & romanticist thought. Modified AA

¶ The debate on modernity is investigated, with particular attention to Dick Howard's From Marx to Kant (Albany: State U of New York Press, 1985). Howard is a founder of a group of US social theorists of radical orientation. His book examines, from a primarily philosophical angle, the basic structure of the paradoxes & problems of modernity, & their manifestations in various spheres, especially in politics & philosophy. He uses the term "originary" to characterize the archetypal structure of the modern & defines it thus: "An originary structure is characterized by the immanent copresence or tension of the demand to explain genesis & the imperative to legitimate normativity." Howard's proposals for a strategy to overcome the paradoxes of the modern are discussed. C. Waters

¶ Labor & capital are usually considered as the primary factors of production, the costs of which are of utmost importance, in contrast, nature as the essential third factor, is disregarded. Natural resources are generally assumed to be always available, self-regenerating, & to be exploited without long-term costs. Hans Immler's new treatise (Natur in der ökonomischen Theorie [Nature in Economic Theory], Opladen, West Germany: Westdeutscher, 1985) represents an important contribution in that he emphasizes the new role & function of the natural environment & its neglect, in the formulation of theories of value & their long-term consequences on contemporary economic theories & on the person & society. Immler's evaluation traces nature's role & function, or their neglect, in the formulation of theories of value through the writings of Aristotle, St. Thomas Aquinas, William Petty, John Locke, Adam Smith, David Ricardo, Karl Marx, & others, along with Francois Quesnay & the Physiocrats. 4 References. * Questionnaire data collected in 1983 were used to compare the perceptions of community leaders (N = 86) & the general public (N = 379) of Rawlins, Wyo, regarding the importance of 22 proposed community work projects, as well as their perceptions of the importance of, & satisfaction with, various dimensions of community life. On a general level, leaders & residents were consistent in their perceptions of community life, however, on a specific task or project level, their views differed considerably. * Economic problems, especially unemployment, in southern Italy are investigated, based on statistical & other evidence. The unemployment rate in the South has increased sharply over the past decade & is expected to continue to increase, because of the predicted birthrate & further decrease of jobs in agriculture. A reduction of jobs in industry is occurring throughout Italy, because of the transition to a phase in which progress is based on intensification of existing industrial capital rather than extension. This situation is made more severe in the South by lack of communication & by the absence of organizational efficiency among these institutions, associations, & political & social forces that should be in charge of a new phase of intervention. 1 Table. * A longitudinal study of the Ur Leadership Program that sought to reshape community leadership networks in a large midwestern metropolitan area. Two program classes of approximately 50 persons each replicated in microcosm the ethnic, gender, & occupational diversity of the area's leaders. Analysis of questionnaire & interview data collected when the program began & ended & 3 years later reveals that program participation resulted in increased contacts among participants, which persisted for the first class only, contacts with whites increased, but not with blacks, & new networks emerged & old ones were strengthened for addressing community issues. Factors underlying leadership networks included contacts with black leaders, the social establishment, political leaders, business leaders, & community activists. Implications for using microcosm interventions to influence larger systems are discussed. 2 Tables, 4 Figures, 38 References. HA

* Sociological theorists are now attempting to associate a supposed return to the private with a parallel return to community. Both these concepts are central to sociological theory, but are surrounded by confusion & by numerous historical referents that confirm their importance but & conceal their significance. The literature on this subject is reviewed & the various problematics for which the "private sphere" is a key concept are explored. It is concluded that civil society determines the modalities of discussion & the degree of autonomy of the private, thus, an approach from the side of the "private" or of "community" can only be of restricted value. 38 References. * Community development practitioners frequently face community conflict over land use that results in a virtual standoff. A model developed from seven interrelated social factors is presented to help diagnose these kinds of community conflicts. To verify the model & illustrate its utility, the standoff over the Berm Highway routing in Alton, Ill, is analyzed using interview data from 32 community leaders who were either direct participants or expert observers of the conflict. The participants tended to cite more microlevel factors than did the observers. These findings suggest the importance of broadening participants' definition of community conflict situations through more direct interaction with observers. 2 Tables, 28 References. HA

* A multidisciplinary analysis of the 1978-1981 case history of the development of the Marigold Library System, the first Ru public regional library system in Alberta, with particular reference to the diffusion of innovations in a Ru society. Findings support a new overarching theoretical framework for interorganizational change management, which studies how network agents facilitate communication in community planning networks. This framework presents the gradual development of an understanding of common problems & the collaborative execution of joint action programs by organizations concerned with solving shared problems in their environments. The case suggests the possibility of extending the theoretical frameworks by incorporation of key community development models. AA

* Previous sociological literature suggests that many elements of community - eg, cohesion, autonomy, & local leadership, tend to disappear as the larger society comes to dominate local activities. A case study of community actions & leadership in Seabrook, NH 1950-1980, based on interviews with key informants (N = 8) & official & unofficial documents, indicates a persistence of community, despite changes in local characteristics. The community retained its essential pattern of leadership & action while it became more diverse & dynamic. Findings suggest that substantial change, while perhaps inevitable for small towns on the fringes of a metropolitan society, need not spell the demise of community. 1 Table, 10 References. * Conflicting concepts of "community" that emerged in nationalist, internationalist, & pacifist writings published in Germany between 1914 & 1933 are reflected in many literary treatments of German military & civilian experience. These concepts & their social, political, & philosophical ramifications are handled with varying degrees of tendentiousness in prose narratives of the war. Several novels of civilian life dramatize the concept of false, antipathetic social order & the individual's psychological relationship to such a nationalist order. Even today many ideological myths impede rational conflict resolution not only for national communities but for the world community. Conflicts & conflict resolution are complicated by three problems: (1) the existence of divergent rational

* Impacts of oil developments on Alaska's North Slope area are compared with perceptions of expected oil impacts in the Norton Sound-Bering Sea (NSBS) region. NSBS Native American communities will not be entitled to oil royalties & other local government income because developments will go beyond their territorial jurisdiction, unlike North Slope villages. Although attitude surveys show opposition to developments based on impressions about environmental & social impacts, communities hope to receive employment benefits & to minimize adverse impact. The NSBS communities are more diverse culturally & more scattered geographically than the North Slope villages, & there is subsequently much less agreement on attitudes about oil developments. 5 Tables, 1 Figure, 14 References. Ryan, Vernon D. (Dept Sociology & Anthropology Iowa State U, Ames 50010), Citizen Surveys, Democracy, and Public Interests: Words of Caution and Words of Advice, ♦ Journal of the Community Development Society, 1986, 17, 2, 39-53

* In community development, citizen surveys have become a popular tool for collecting information on topics of local interest. According to Kenneth J. Arrow (Social Choice and Individual Values, New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1951), the practice of aggregating individuals' responses often results in ill-advised measures of common problems & preferences. In effect, rational measures of common problems & preferences cannot be achieved by aggregating individual choices using democratic rules. To overcome this "voting paradox," a multifaceted format is proposed where additional information is obtained on Rs' acceptance or nonacceptance of alternative options. In addition to improving the quality of information available through citizen surveys, the alternative format expands the educational role of the community development professional. It also places the survey within the context of action research & encourages the acceptance of action strategies that are more in line with the objectives of most community development programs. The usefulness of the multifaceted format is illustrated via a case study of a community attitude survey in a small midwestern US area. 4 Tables, 12 References. Modified HA

¶ A historical synthesis of the political activity of a Tzotzil community in the highlands of Chiapas, Mexico, between 1946 & 1984, based on various studies, press reports, & 1969-1971 fieldwork, supplemented by later visits up to 1984. Focus is on the power structure & the significance of social processes & their repercussions on community life. The intricate relationship between the traditional system of office-holding, the local government, & the state & federal authorities is investigated. The relations between two social groups—the traditional & the acculturated Indians—also highlights a process of internal domination. The presence of state agents (eg, officials & teachers) tends to consolidate the group of acculturated Indians, who have access to wage labor & a type of development separate from the traditional hierarchies. Confronted with this phenomenon, the traditional Indian population at times tries to take advantage of public institutions, to the extent that these can fit their needs. 15 References. Modified HA

¶ The colonization of the northern Quebec areas of Abitibi & Temiscamingue is recounted to illustrate two stages of development, seeking to remedy a lack of research on the area. Starting in the late nineteenth century, the first stage, led by Ivanhoe Caron, followed the opening of the transcontinental railroad, which should have encouraged population growth in the area. However, the era was characterized by adversaries of colonization, as evidenced by the lack of support from the province. The second stage showed an attitude reversal, wherein the province intervened & aided at times of regional crisis, seeking to promote directed colonization as opposed to the previous spontaneous colonization. The area has been exploited for its natural resources, but it has been ignored by researchers, probably due to its geographic isolation, poverty, & low-density population. D Graves

Examples are given of the practical ways in which the CRP has been able to put Coll resources to use in assisting & training local community activists. It is argued that the roles of CRP staff in mediating between Coll & community are crucial in the delivery of this service, & these roles are fully explicated. Explored are the possibilities of developing issue-based, activist education drawing on the bodies of knowledge within the Coll, linked to independent, localized community development initiatives. ¶ Some aspects of the culture of southern Italy today are investigated, in particular, the confrontation between two forms of organization of collective life, community organization & company organization. These are sometimes complementary, but more often in conflict. This is not merely a question of structural effects: more importantly, it has to do with psychological attitudes, eg, concern with the future. The South is considered a "poor culture", its development can take place only through a recovery of autonomy within the industrial organization. Social policy must include cultural as well as economic elements, & favor local concerns without necessarily rejecting existing institutions. Modified HA

Moxley, Robert L. & Hannah, T. Susanne, Individual Participation Patterns in Community Social Action, ♦ Journal of the Community Development Society, 1986, 17, 2, 1-23.

¶ An investigation of the process by which actions of community groups are initiated & carried out, & of key characteristics of individual participation in community action projects. Social actions in 2 NC communities (called Growton & Stableton) are analyzed using archival information & interview & questionnaire data from key informants ($N = 41$) & those identified as central participants ($N = 121$) in 11 community projects between 1970 & 1980. The findings contradict popular perceptions of community development action projects as either involving large segments of the community or being led by a few highly active persons. Very little overlap in core group participation was found between projects. However, the hypothesis that community projects rely significantly on the internal resources of voluntary organizations, especially civic clubs, received clear support. There were no evident advantages in participation rates in the larger & faster growing community, but the participants were younger, more often Ms from the business community &/or "newcomers," & generally less dependent on external financial support. 6 Tables, 11 References. ¶ Martin Buber's theory of community, in which the kibbutz plays a key role (Paths in Utopia, London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1949), is compared with the social philosophy of the kibbutz as expressed in the writings of its members, primarily during the kibbutz's formative years (1911 through the early 1930s). The two concepts are found to coincide with respect to the desirability of dyadic I-Thou relationships & mutual responsibility. However, it is argued that Buber presents an ideal & distorted picture of the kibbutz: he ignores its members' views on the varieties of communal experience, & the values of work & pioneering & their results. Buber also ignores the elements of democracy, equality, & self-realization, & rejects the idea of nonreligious communal experience. It is concluded that the real kibbutz is a better model for a philosophy of community than Buber's version. 47 References. Modified HA

* The Marxian theory of class dynamics is discussed as too outdated to apply to advanced capitalist societies. It is argued that Karl Marx's concept of SC applies when the line between capital & labor is unambiguous, technologies are simple, & labor is homogeneous. Rational equitable democracy is an alternative concept to Marxian definitions of exploitation & justice, & is applicable to advanced capitalism in the 'minimax' class society, where SC boundaries derive from an individual's status as (1) provider of labor, (2) provider of capital, & (3) consumer. 1 Figure, 55 References. * Higher dimensional multivariate time series models suffer from the problem of overparametrization, which impairs their forecasting performance. Starting from such unrestricted vector autoregressive models, two ways to cope with this difficulty are discussed: reducing the number of free parameters by applying a subset modeling strategy, & utilizing a Bayesian approach by formulating "priors," which are then combined with sample information, but leaving the original specification unaltered. Using Austrian quarterly macroeconomic time series data, a comparative study is undertaken by running alternative forecasting exercises. Both methods improve out-of-sample forecasting performance substantially at the cost of some bias in ex post simulations. Comparing the ex ante prediction of the two approaches, the former does better at short horizons whereas the latter gains as the forecast horizon lengthens. 3 Tables, 19 References. HA

* In recent years computer-aided production control systems have become available for small-batch mechanical engineering. Using these systems, the scheduling of production can be better planned than has been the case using the classic method with a foreman, which has long represented the typical form of organization in mechanical engineering production. Results of an empirical investigation into the use of EDP-aided (acronym not defined) production control systems in 24 West German mechanical engineering firms are summarized. Two different management concepts are identified: total planning & control (of the production process), & framework planning & control. The consequences of production control systems installed according to these concepts for foremen, workers, control personnel, & operating results are explored using data from observations, questionnaires, & group/individual interviews (N not specified). In addition, the design of computer-aided production control systems is discussed, taking into account the interests of all groups in the firm. 2 Tables, 3 References. Modified HA

* A discussion of the functions of global models, what they attempt to accomplish, their limitations, & what they have in common. Various developments & criticisms of global modeling since 1970 are reviewed. It is suggested that different global models share a common understanding of how the world works, & that this understanding is thus far lost on nations & leaders. Global modeling reinforces the importance of political decisions, especially in the context of the interdependency of nations & the increasing significance of global changes after the year 2000. The importance of shedding habitual attitudes of pessimism or optimism about the future is emphasized. 1 Anderson

* A number of conceptual & methodological questions arising from work motivation research in Africa are discussed. A principal assumption is that cross-cultural psychologists should be able to provide practical advice to social planners. It is argued that a theory of values based on a cognitive social learning perspective provides a basis on which a search for cross-cultural universals could be pursued alongside a clearer delineation of factors influencing work motivation in particular cultures. As much of the research in work motivation continues to utilize instruments that replicate factors found in Western countries, alternatives that reveal indigenous value constructs are discussed. It is concluded that further significant advances depend on a greater degree of cooperation among researchers to carry out large scale validation studies, & the involvement of local psychologists. 64 References. Brunner, Ronald D. (Center Public Policy Research U Colorado, Boulder 80309), Key Political Symbols: The Dissociation Process, Policy Sciences, 1987, 20, 1, Apr, 53-76

* Key political symbols, used to fashion consensus & misused for purposes of exploitation, are an important but neglected topic in the policy sciences. Scientific inquiry into the possibilities for maximizing consent & minimizing exploitation have been stymied by a lack of systematic, empirical methods, despite a rich theoretical tradition that has been available for decades. Through a case study of the key symbol "Watergate," some methods for the study of key political symbols & the opinion formation process are introduced. Evidence from newspaper headlines & editorials is used to show how Watergate became dissociated from its original reference to a building in Washington, DC, & came to symbolize a complex of issues involving integrity in government. Political & theoretical implications of this process of issue expansion & simplification are discussed in relation to other unfolding policy issues. 2 Tables, 2 Figures, 21 References. Modified HA

* A new approach is presented to evaluating public policy initiatives, based on a more careful examination of the effects markets have on the course of public policies employing producer incentives to achieve policy goals. The past experience of Ur renewal is reviewed to show the relationship between policy objectives & outcomes when policy is designed to work through the marketplace. By arguing that market incentives constrain policy outcomes, it is maintained that policies that are judged to have failed in their goals may in reality have succeeded when viewed in terms of normal market operations. 37 References. Healy, Paul (Dept Philosophy University Coll Cork, Republic Ireland), Interpretive Policy Inquiry: A Response to the Limitations of the Received View, Policy Sciences, 1986, 19, 4, Dec, 381-396

Comment, 397-405.

† A contribution to the growing body of literature on interpretive policy inquiry which contends that the interpretive (hermeneutic) approach can correct many of the shortcomings inherent in the standard ("received") view of policymaking that is based on a positivistic style of inquiry. Problems with the received view are summarized, & a systematic, philosophically grounded statement of the interpretive position is developed. The relationship between the positivist & interpretive paradigms is examined, & some positive consequences of the latter for policymaking are discussed. In Interpretive Policy Inquiry: A Response to Its Limitations, Douglas Torgerson (Trent U, Peterborough, Ontario) asserts that, with positivist & technocratic notions still prevalent, Healy's argument both underscores the limitations of conventional analysis & allows for an understanding of the policy process in human terms. However, the analysis falls short of a systematic presentation of the interpretive position, & reveals the limitations of such an approach, an explicitly critical examination is needed, & is demonstrated through an analysis of Machiavelli's prepositivist approach to interpretive inquiry. 50 References. † The importance of human judgment in econometric forecasting & the general superiority of ex ante over ex post forecasts provide evidence of model misspecification, which casts doubt on the validity of econometric policy simulations. An inadequate basis for selection among alternative models with differing policy implications further undermines the utility of these models in policy analysis & in hypothesis testing. Despite this record of performance, macroeconomic models thrive & are widely used in policy analysis. Some reasons for their survival & importance in policy are suggested, & guidelines for the use of econometric models in the policy process are given. 1 Table, 36 References. HA

† Government expenditure for housing in the Netherlands is discussed, with special attention to the 1986 case of alleged bribes & fraud in housing subsidy grants on the part of senior officials of the ABP (Algemeen Burgerlijk Pensioenfonds, the Dutch civil service pension fund). The 1979 collapse of the housing market & increase in unemployment led to increased government housing subsidies. In the course of the ABP case, it was alleged that the Ministry of Housing overpaid, in subsidies, hundreds of millions of guilders to the ABP between 1968 & 1981. In 1987, an investigation chaired by State Secretary Broeks concluded that only 20% of the cases were questionable. While the Dutch government has always tried to ensure good housing & sound policy, it is now feared that, due to the ABP case, housing subsidies will be discredited. D. Graves

Taylor-Gooch, Peter (U Kent, Canterbury CT2 7NZ England), Consumption Cleavages and Welfare Politics, ♦ Political Studies, 1986, 34, 4, Dec, 592-606

† The role of consumption cleavages in influencing political behavior has received a great deal of attention in recent years. It is argued that some critics have misunderstood the approach as a theory about the direct influence of social circumstances on behavior, rather than as a theory about the way in which people's perceptions of one another's positions in relation to the means of consumption are articulated by political parties to become bases of political action. P. Dunleavy ("The Urban Basis of Political Alignment," British Journal of Political Science, 1979, 9) has argued that ideas about self-interest in state & private consumption in relation to other people are of the greatest importance in this, while P. Saunders (see SA 33 1/8505034) suggests that the security associated with private property rights has stronger influence. Both these claims are tested with data from a 1984 questionnaire survey, of 1,111 registered voters in the UK. "Consumption sector" is shown to play a minor but significant role in influencing ideas. Part of this influence appears to lie in

¶ It is argued that the technological & economic state of today's global system is qualitatively different & less pessimistic than that predicted by Club of Rome forecasters (eg. see Meadows, Donella H., et al. Limits to Growth, New York: Universe Books, 1972). Rather, the global system tends to maximize the positive or constructive effects of its development & minimize the negative or destructive effects. The fundamental criterion of this process of optimization is the development & use of the intellectual potential power (IPP) of mankind. An operative definition of the qualitative content of IPP is provided & applied to certain unpredictable, critical events in the post-1984 global scenario. 5 Figures. Modified HA

¶ The practice of forecasting has been institutionalized within the social sciences of socialist countries as a means of accelerating development.

Current way of life is a significant predictor of macrosocial process. Two forecasts, one optimistic & one pessimistic, are developed for Czechoslovakia for the years up to 2010. Emphasized is the need for social-control organs to solve the problem of transforming Czechoslovakia's national economy from an extensive to an intensive pattern of reproduction. A progressive social policy is the starting point for the gradual acceleration of socialist development. 9 References. Modified HA

¶ An evaluation of the current way of life in Czechoslovakia & a forecast of the future. Several problems are pointed out, including low effectiveness of socially productive work, ineffective enforcement of time economy, insufficient provision of a market supply of goods & services, & satisfactory level & quality of goods & services from social consumption funds. While SC inequalities have largely been overcome, the basic differentiation principle of remuneration according to production, which is intrinsic to socialism, is not effectively practiced. Future development will depend on the emergence of a qualitatively new form of social reproduction. Necessary steps in this direction include raising the average material & cultural level of life, enforcing a socially just distribution, & activating the human factor. The objective process leading to these goals are described. 9 References. Modified HA

¶ The physical quality of life (PQoL) in capitalist & socialist countries is compared, taking into account the level of economic development, using World Bank statistics pertaining to 123 countries (accounting for approximately 97% of the world's population). PQoL variables included (1) indicators of health, health services, demographic conditions, & nutrition (infant mortality rate, child death rate, life expectancy, crude death rate, crude birthrate, population per MD, population per nursing person, & daily per capita calorie supply); (2) measures of education (adult literacy rate, enrollment in secondary education, & enrollment in higher education); & (3) a composite PQoL index. All PQoL measures improved as economic development increased. Cross-tabulations, analysis of variance, & regression techniques all confirm the conclusion that the socialist countries generally have achieved better PQoL outcomes than the capitalist countries at equivalent levels of economic development. 4 Tables, 23 References. Modified HA

¶ The Dutch political system traditionally has preferred private nonprofit organizations for the implementation of welfare policies. Here, measures taken & the arguments put forward to justify the constantly increasing government interference in these organizations during 1945-1985 are examined. From 1945 to 1963, reference was made to the exceptional circumstances caused by WWII & postwar reconstruction. Post-1963, the way interventions were prepared provided their justification, which resulted in an unbalanced & unprecedented growth between 1963 & 1973; the too costly output provided grounds for intervention after 1973. This output-oriented legitimization was then replaced in 1981 by reference to external circumstances: the economic crisis & the need to cut back expenditures. None of these arguments deals with health care needs: the arguments put forward to justify a policy are not explanatory of that policy. 9 Tables, 17 References. Modified HA

* A review essay on a book by Rick Roderick, Habermas and the Foundations of Critical Theory (London: Macmillan, 1986 [see listing in IRPS No. 42]). An attempt to provide nonexperts with an overview of Jürgen Habermas's critical theory. The relationships & tensions between Hegelian, Kantian, & Marxian perspectives are discussed, along with their influence on the development of Habermas's thought. It is argued that this work is too short (175 pages) to adequately cover the whole of the Habermasian corpus. Particularly weak are its: (1) discussion of Habermas's theory of communicative action, which fails to pay sufficient attention to the major argument concerning the relation between meaning & validity; (2) analysis of Habermas's relationship to foundationalism; (3) interpretation of Habermas's work as merely a continuation of the Frankfurt school's critique of the rationality of modern society, when in fact it introduced a radically different notion of rationality; & (4) reliance on Marxism as the sole solution to the theory-praxis problem, which severely impedes a nondismissive critique of Habermas. ¶ Current discourse on poverty, social policy, & the welfare state is compared with the debate on the Poor Law of 1834 in England. The Poor Law was a political & ideological reaction against earlier social policy, which resulted in a confrontation between liberal & collectivist ideologies. This discussion still plays a role in the current debate between opponents & defenders of social policy programs. Divergent ideological positions tend to become manifest in periods of economic crisis, when financial resources are scarce. A main theme of the discussion is the role of the state & the relative responsibilities of the state vs the individual in maintaining personal well-being. Other themes are: privatization, individual liberty vs social justice, the role of the market, & social needs. 21 References. Modified HA

¶ An overview is presented of the basic concepts, themes, & recent debates in rational choice theory, bringing together disparate elements from the fields of microeconomics, game theory, & theory of public goods. The concept of the rational actor & the question of the possibility of rational cooperation have become a stimulating paradigm for political & social research. An exploration of the actor's preconditions for processing information, decision making, strategic interaction, rational planning, & rational choice leads to a new analytical concept of the actor. In this context, the work of Jon Elster is particularly relevant. Rational Choice, Oxford, Blackwell, 1986. Becoming capable of acting rationally presupposes strategies of self-design & the ability to deal with "internal" collective goods dilemmas. The limitations of rational action are also discussed. 113 References. Modified HA

¶ Since the early 1970s, policy scholars have paid great attention to issues of policy implementation, treating it as the "missing link" between policy formulation & results. Most often, policy problems have been treated as static phenomena that can be corrected by carefully specified programs. Drawing on examples from Swedish energy policy, it is argued that this is not the case, that political & social conditions are so powerful that to change that implementation must be a dynamic process if it is to be effective. Conceptual & practical implications for the study & design of policy implementation are considered. 78 References. HA

Cheney, Jim (Dept Philosophy U Wisconsin Center, Waukesha 53186-1628), Eco-Feminism and Deep Ecology, Environmental Ethics, 1987, 9, 2, summer, 115-145

† An investigation of the degree to which the branch of environmentalism known as "deep ecology"—the view that moral consideration should be extended to the entire biotic community—embodies a feminist sensibility. The ambivalent attitude of "eco-feminism" toward deep ecology is briefly explored, & shown to stem from the fact that deep ecology assimilates feminist insights to a basically masculine ethical orientation. Some of the ways that deep ecology theory might change if it adopted a fundamentally feminist ethical orientation are explored, drawing largely on the works of psychologist Carol Gilligan (In a Different Voice: Psychological Theory and Women's Development, Cambridge, Mass: Harvard U Press, 1982) & various feminist philosophers. † A survey of West German & Yugoslav literature reveals a wide variety of strategies employed by ecological movements. The basic critical position taken by the ecological movements against industrial society is supported; however, their conservative ideological tendencies & neglect of class struggle as a part of human emancipation are criticized. 27 References. † The use of artificial intelligence (AI) in natural resource management began with the development of expert systems for problem solving & decision making. The use of expert systems in turn led to the development of other AI procedures pertinent to natural resource management. Of particular significance are (1) integrated expert systems that link management models with natural resource models; (2) intelligent geographic information systems that permit interpretation of relations within & among landscape data themes; & (3) AI modeling of animal behavior & interaction with the environment. These procedures provide new ways to view classic problems in systems analysis. 4 Figures. HA

Crespi, Muriel & Greenberg, Adolph, Humanistic Conservation: A Proposed Alliance between Anthropology and Environmentalists, ♦ Central Issues in Anthropology, 1987, 7, 1, Apr, 25-31

† Case materials are used to describe the impact of past conservation actions on local peoples; the literature dealing with man & the biosphere & other conservation programs is also reviewed. It is suggested that recent developments in ecological anthropology, particularly the advent of processual models, can provide the basis for an important rapprochement among the imperatives underlying natural resource policies, eg, the rights of local populations to traditional resources, & a respect for cultural diversity. These approaches, along with an anthropological outreach to environmentalists, will benefit local peoples, anthropology, & the continued efforts to protect the world biome. 27 References. Space as a Force of Production: Contribution to the Debate on Realism, Capitalism and Space, International Journal of Urban and Regional Research, 1987, 11, 3, Sept, 405-416

† The relationship between capitalism & sociospatial concentration is explored by comparing a variety of Marxist theories of urban analysis. Several theoretical stances are integrated to illustrate three forces of production: (1) labor, (2) technology/knowledge, & (3) space. These forces tend to conflict with each other due to differing paces of change. It is reasoned that if space is a force of production, then sociospatial design, or planning, is a developmental force in society. An integration of social change & spatial planning that would transcend the current outcome (spatial clustering) of capitalist production is recommended. 22 References. D. Graves

† As future manned space missions become longer, & as crews become more heterogeneous, psychological & interpersonal factors will take on increasing importance in assuring mission success. On the basis of a review of 60+ US & Soviet space simulation studies on Earth, along with reports from US & Soviet space missions, 9 psychological & 7 interpersonal issues are discussed along with pertinent research findings & examples from manned spaceflights. Lawrence, Elizabeth A. (School Veterinary Medicine Tufts U, Medford MA 02155), Relationships with Animals: The Impact of Human Culture, ♦ UM National Forum, 1986, 66, 1, winter, 14-18.

† The role of culture in human interactions with animals is discussed, using the bear as a representative animal. In many cultures, the bear is a symbol of strength, courage, & wisdom (to hibernate), as well as an object of terror. Killing a bear has been considered as a sign of manhood by both primitive & modern hunters. However, some scholars assert that bears only inflict injury when humans encroach on their territory. Livestock owners disagree. Society must decide whether wild animals have the right to live undisturbed in their own domain. It is recommended that, before deciding, humans must consider their kinship to other living creatures & the fact that man is part of the earth & not its owner. D. Graves

Four problems currently considered to be global threats are explored: deforestation, acid decomposition, atmospheric carbon dioxide, & nuclear winter.

Young, Helen (Oxfam Health Unit, 274 Banbury Rd Oxford OX2 7D2 England). The Development of Aid Agency Policy on the Use of Imported Biscuits in Emergency Relief, Disasters. 1986, 10, 4, 250-257

* During 1985, 5,000+ tons of biscuits were sent to Ethiopia & Sudan & made freely available to recognized agencies operating emergency relief feeding programs. Results of a field study of 34 such programs reveals the popularity of biscuits with both program supervisors & recipients. The 28 brands used are analyzed in terms of their nutritional value, packaging, accompanying information, acceptability to beneficiaries, & costs. It is concluded that biscuits have a limited, but useful role to play in the early stages of emergency relief. Guidelines for both donors & users are presented that emphasize their joint responsibilities in minimizing the misuse of biscuits. 3 Tables, 6 References. Modified HA

* A comparison of the development of geographical thought in Denmark, Norway, & Sweden after WWII, with particular focus on general SI-relations & political-ideological conditions, specific intra- & interscientific relations, & the influence of pioneers. Internationally, Sweden has held a strong position in human geography due to both the close connection between geography & regional planning in Sweden & the presence of pioneers in the discipline. Contrary to Sweden, the main task of geography in Norway & Denmark has been the training of teachers, which has resulted in a dominance of traditional regional geography. In Norway, this situation has been worsened by strong competition from other social sciences with higher academic standards. In Denmark, a strong Marxist human geography developed in the 1970s, in part due to the active, radical political milieu in Denmark, as well as to the state of Danish geography. 2 Figures, 34 References. Beatty, William W. & Troster, Alexander I. (Dept Psychology North Dakota State U, Fargo 58105). Gender Differences in Geographical Knowledge, Sex Roles. 1987, 16, 11-12, June, 565-590

* In 5 experiments involving 1,800+ undergraduate students, Ms more accurately located places on maps of the US or its various regions than did Fs. These gender differences could not be attributed to education, travel history, desire to travel, or in the amount of incidental exposure to several potential sources of geographic information in everyday lives. Ms performed more accurately than Fs on measures of egocentric & allocentric spatial orientation, but performance on these tasks was only weakly predictive of accuracy on tests of geographical knowledge. Since Ms & Fs learned the locations of places on an unfamiliar map at similar rates, regardless of whether such learning occurred under intentional or incidental instructions, gender differences in geographical knowledge cannot be attributed to differences in capacity to learn place locations on maps. An attentional hypothesis is proposed to account for the more accurate performance of Ms on tests of geographical knowledge, ie, Fs are less likely to pay attention to maps because Ms are more likely than Fs to plan the route to an unfamiliar place. 7 Tables, 15 References. Sutton, Keith & Lawless, Richard I. (Dept Geography U Manchester, M13 9PL England). Progress in the Human Geography of the Maghreb, Progress in Human Geography. 1987, 11, 1, Mar, 60-105

* Progress in the human geography of the Maghreb, North Africa, is assessed through a bibliographical review of about 400 books, chapters, & articles published between 1977 & 1986. Work done by British, French, & Maghrebi geographers predominates, several studies by Germans, Italians, & Americans are also found. Subject sections include: general works, the field's environmental, historical, & political background, population geography, agriculture & Ru settlement, economic development, industrialization, & tourism, Ur, social, & transport issues, & regional development planning & geography. Considerable geographical research & writing is now being undertaken by Maghrebi geographers who are increasingly being trained in native U institutes. The widening academic links between Maghrebi geographers & other geographical centers outside of France are described. Bibliography. Modified AA

† An empirical, quantitative investigation of the more commonly cited references in Italian sociological studies of territory. Using a survey technique tested earlier in the sociology of science, the bibliographic citations included in the final reports of 5 conferences on the sociology of territory that took place in Italy between 1981 & 1985 are analyzed. These constitute a corpus of 176 articles by 114 authors, containing a total of 2,529 citations. Among the 76 authors cited most frequently, 40 are Italians & 36 are foreign. The Italian authors cited tend to be contemporary specialists in the sociology of territory, while the foreign authors are more likely to be general, classical sociologists. 5 Tables. Modified HA

† After describing the human capital model of migration (see Sjaastad, Larry A., "The Costs and Returns of Human Migration," Journal of Political Economy, 1962, 70, 5, Part 2, Oct, 80-93) & Michael P. Todaro's "A Model of Labor Migration and Urban Employment for Less Developed Countries," American Economic Review, 1969, 59, 1, Mar, 138-148), an econometric analysis is presented of the mass migration from North China to Manchuria that occurred between 1891 & 1942. The model is empirically estimated using an ordinary least squares regression analysis to investigate the effects of migration on each area's labor markets & to determine the influence of changes in economic structure & the incidence of disasters—particularly floods, famines, & warlord conflicts—on migration decisions. The importance of this migration for the economic history of modern China is discussed, & some suggestions are offered for further research. 6 Tables, 1 Figure. K. Hyatt

† A discussion of the 1984 industrial accident at the Union Carbide Plant in Bhopal, Madhya Pradesh, India, focusing on the role of the citizen-anthropologist in studying his own society. The details of the Bhopal accident are reviewed & the extent of the disaster is assessed. The anthropological study of the effects of such events on the sociocultural system is proposed as an ethnography of current events. † Norway was caught unaware & ill-prepared by the Caesium 137 fall-out from the Chernobyl (USSR) nuclear power plant accident in Apr 1986. The government's definition of the crisis & what should be done about it differed from that in neighboring Sweden, & the motives behind government measures were questioned by the public. It appeared to many that the government's regulations regarding permissible radiation were an informal trade tariff against Eastern European countries & that they were also detrimental to the Saami (Lapp) culture. Here, the following issues are considered: (1) the relation of accident to routine, (2) the way the government handled the public risk factor; (3) the ways in which every effort was made to imprint a routine onto the handling of the crisis/accident, & (4) the relation between the nonroutine & the public expression of ideology. 12 References. † Sweden's democratic socialism, as a response to economic vulnerability, is explored with regard to its applicability to Australia's political economy. Small economies, such as Sweden's & Australia's, are subject to internal economic crises, since they lack the cushion of an extensive domestic market that would shield them from the repercussions of world economic fluctuations. Sweden has achieved a measure of domestic stabilization in the fields of welfare provision, labor market policy to limit unemployment, & corporatist wage bargaining. The major obstacles preventing Australia from effecting such social reforms are the opposition of the Right; the government's current stance that public intervention cannot be condoned if it means an increase in total taxation, & Australia's present inability to sustain the high level of economic growth required for domestic stabilization. † A description of the entitlement approach to famines put forward by Amartya Sen (Poverty and Famine: An Essay on Entitlement and Deprivation, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1981) within the broader contexts of the methodology of economics as a social science & the various concepts of scarcity. Using McCloskey's view ("The Rhetoric of Economics," Journal of Economic Literature, 1985, 21, 2, June, 481-517) of economics as rhetoric, it is argued that although economists tell stories, they also need to provide a substructure of a well-worked theory for their fellow professionals to swallow the story. Thus cranks who suggest simple solutions to the economic problems tell the story but fail to provide substructure. In the cases of J. M. Keynes & Sen, there is a continuing dispute about the adequacy of the substructure provided. Unlike neoclassical economics, they view scarcity as a social, not a natural, phenomenon. Thus Sen ties starvation not to lack of food but to failure of exchange entitlements, & stretches the economic framework to accommodate & respond to noneconomic considerations. 2 Figures, 3 Illustrations, 34 References. † Census statistics relating to poverty in the US are reviewed. Since the late 1960s, a slackening growth of aggregate demand & an increasing number of younger relative to older adults have caused a severe deterioration in the wage & unemployment rates of young adults. This deterioration has raised poverty rates of children & young adults directly, through its impact on income within families of given types, especially married-couple families; & indirectly, through its impact on the demographic composition of young adults, especially through the rise in headed families due to increased divorce & nonmarital fertility rates. The prospect over the next 15 years is for a favorable shift in relative labor supply &, less confidently, in the growth of aggregate demand that would, by the 1990s, reverse the recent trend toward higher poverty rates at younger adult ages & among children. 7 Figures, 28 References. † An attempt to describe the relationship between the current US political & economic situation & the escalating rate of homelessness, with focus on explaining the responses of the welfare state & larger social order within the context of a crisis in capital accumulation. The fiscal crisis' effect on marketplace wage reductions is demonstrated, & it is argued that redefinitions of the real value of the social wage intensify poverty & thus increase homelessness. Temporary shelters for the homeless are compared to the workhouses of the nineteenth century, & criticized for undermining many of the social wage gains made over the past 50 years. Political & practice implications are discussed, with particular emphasis on the critical role of shelter social workers & clergy in organizing campaigns to combat homelessness at its roots. 1 Photograph. † The magnitude, distribution, & factors associated with food poverty among Kenyan small farmers are examined using household expenditure data from the first Integrated Ru Survey conducted in 1974/75 (Central Bureau of Statistics, Nairobi: Ministry of Finance & Development, 1977). A new measure of food poverty—defined as the lack of resources necessary to acquire a nutritionally adequate diet—is introduced that is decomposable & sets the regional food poverty line on the basis of the observed diet consumed & its caloric rather than monetary shortfalls. This method is combined with results of a multivariate analysis to develop a food poverty profile of a sample of 1,272 farmers based on 6 sets of variables: region of residence, household size & composition, landholding size, cropping pattern & market involvement, type of employment, & characteristics of the household head. Household income emerges as the primary determinant of calorie consumption, though other factors affect food poverty through a number of complex mechanisms. 10 Tables. K. Hyatt

Gupta, Shiv Prakash (Dept Sociology U Jodhpur, 342003 Rajasthan India), Comparative Study of Religiosity among the Rural and the Urban Poor, The Journal of Sociological Studies, 1987, 6, Jan, 173-178.

† An exploration of the religious beliefs of the poor in Indian society, based on data from 250 Ur & 150 Ru households in Kanpur Nagar District. Belief in God & in family deities is widespread; in contrast, belief in spirits of the dead is rare. Belief in reincarnation is also widespread. Ritual obligations regarding fasting are widely observed, though non-vegetarian diet is common & tolerance of addictions even more so. A majority of the Ur poor, but a minority of the Ru poor go on pilgrimages. Reading of religious texts of any kind is rare. 3 Tables, 23 References. W. H. Stoddard

Walker, Robert (Instt Research Social Sciences U York, Heslington YO1 5DD England), Consensual Approaches to the Definition of Poverty: Towards an Alternative Methodology. ♦ Journal of Social Policy, 1987, 16, 2, Apr, 213-226

• Consensual methods, which seek to establish poverty lines by reference to the views of society as a whole, are an important recent development. Three variants are recognized, ie, those that require the public to estimate an adequate minimum income, ask people to specify a list of necessary items, ask what level of benefits the public is prepared to fund. It is suggested that attempts to operationalize the consensual approach have been frustrated by their reliance on survey methodology. Some thoughts are offered on a possible methodology, based on the use of qualitative techniques, which would first explore consensus on the definition of poverty & then, if appropriate, seek directly to determine a socially approved budget standard. 1 Table, 31 References. • China's overall poverty & lack of development are explored in terms of the causes & mechanisms of poverty in individual parts of the country & various social strata, since the position of poor domestic areas is analogous to that of the entire country in the world situation. It is argued that China's current problems are rooted in its failure to understand the necessity of passing through the commodity exchange stage in its journey from a feudalistic to a socialistic society. Errors in early development strategy are discussed, including the development of a highly centralized structure of economic management which paralleled that of the USSR, an irrational Ru industrial structure, lack of education & technical training for the majority of the population, uneven territorial development, persistent feudal influences on political ideology & practice, & a policy of isolation from the outside world. Efforts to correct these mistakes in the sixth five-year plan (1981-1985) are summarized, along with goals for SI development for the year 2000. 3 Photographs. K. Hyatt

Founded in 1973

■ The JPMS is an independent, interdisciplinary, critical, and biannual publication which has withstood the test of time and has entered its second decade of publication. In 1977, the JPMS initiated a policy of guest editors to provide expertise and diversity in the selection process of manuscripts. In 1985, the JPMS became loosely affiliated with the political Sociology section of the American Sociological Association. In the words of Seymour M. Lipset, "The Journal of Political and Military Sociology is clearly the leading publication in political sociology."

■ The JPMS prefers short over long and quality over quantity articles not to exceed 20 to 25 double-spaced pages including footnotes and references. The author should submit four copies along with an abstract of 100-150 words for each manuscript. There is a $10.00 submission fee to help defray costs of processing manuscripts. Address all correspondence about the editing of the Journal and manuscripts submission to either:

¶ Three approaches to defining poverty levels are discussed: social consensus, budget standard, & behavioral. Each addresses different questions & none, of itself, has provided an objective definition of poverty. In particular, they have neglected the issues of time & home production: the time & ability of individuals to prepare food or to wash & feed themselves without assistance, for example, vary greatly depending on circumstances & in turn affect income needs. Choices & constraints affecting the household formations in which people live & their budgeting behavior are also important in assessing poverty. Individual variations in behavior need to be explicitly recognized if practical definitions of poverty levels are to be found. 2 Tables, 16 References. Modified HA

¶ An investigation of the geographic distribution & demographic characteristics of the US homeless that explores some reasons for the increase in their number since the beginning of the 1980s & some possible cures for the situation. Using interview data collected from approximately 1,000 homeless persons in Ohio, several categories of the homeless are developed—those who (1) need assistance far beyond temporary shelter & are unlikely to ever be able to fend for themselves, (2) have been unable to achieve economic self-sufficiency because of a major deficit (eg, illiteracy) or chronic problem (eg, alcoholism) that they cannot cope with unaided; (3) are in short-term crisis situations, & (4) merely need a temporary place to stay. It is concluded that a new system of combined service delivery is needed that can attend to needs other than just housing, which in & of itself can not cure homelessness. K. Hyatt

Poverty is, nevertheless, much more concentrated in the Ru areas than in the Ur areas, although regional differences in its incidence are not as striking as the Ur-Ru divergencies. 5 Tables, 20 References. ¶ The principal problematic issue in all poverty measures in GB is source & status of the standards of needs & deprivation. Rejection of minimum subsistence or quasi-absolute approaches to defining poverty & acceptance of the social relativism of poverty, logically demand that the indicators of deprivation be derived from the society in question not be prescribed for it by experts. Some policy implications of the distinction between deprivation & poverty are reviewed, & two principal approaches to empirical methods of establishing consensual measures of poverty—the income proxy method & the deprivation indicator method—are examined. Sociologically based poverty lines are distinguished from politically based social security scales, & some important aspects of the theoretical & methodological relations between them are outlined. 37 References. Previous work on victimization among F Coll students is extended to include an analysis of some correlates of resistance to sexual aggression & the explanatory capabilities of 3 models of blame-victim precipitation, social control, & situational. F Coll students (N = 206) completed various psychological assessment inventories, questionnaires, & a sexual experience survey. A large proportion of the sample (75%) reported some type of sexual victimization, the majority involving romantic acquaintances who employed varying degrees of physical & verbal coercion/aggression in attempts to engage in sex with an unwilling F partner. Analysis of various personality, attitudinal, & situational factors indicates that the situational blame model is most useful in generating variables associated with resistance to sexual aggression. A functional model of behavior (Kanfer, J. H., & Saslow, G. "Behavioral Diagnosis," in Franks, C. M. [Ed] Behavior Therapy: Appraisal and Status, NY: McGraw-Hill, 1969, 417-444) is applied to sexual victimization to explain successful & unsuccessful resistance & reveal differences in sexual assault by acquaintances & strangers. Data on a nationally representative sample of 2,143 couples, collected in interviews with 1,183 women & 960 men in 1976, are used to study the relationship to marital violence of the power structure of marriage, power norm consensus, & level of marital conflict. The couples were classified as equalitarian, M-dominant, F-dominant, or divided power. Equalitarian couples had the lowest rates of conflict & violence, & M-dominant & F-dominant couples had the highest rates. Although consensus about the legitimacy of a M-dominant & F-dominant power structure reduced conflict & violence in such families, when conflict did occur, it was associated with a much higher risk of violence than a similar level of conflict in equalitarian families. Since equality in marriage is associated with low rates of intrafamily conflict & violence, laws, administrative decisions, & services that empower women & encourage men to value an equal partner are likely to be important steps to reducing violence & strengthening the family. 3 Tables, 4 Figures, 43 References. A review essay of a book edited by David Riches, The Anthropology of Violence (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1986 (see listing in IRPS No. 42)). The editor's claim that he has developed a theory of violence in which both practical & symbolic goals of violence have been given an equal place is questioned: it is argued that a semiology of violence cannot develop with the dichotomous division of the practical vs the symbolic in its conceptual framework. Some methodological weaknesses are also evident. However, a major achievement of this volume lies in those essays where anthropologists have tried to develop languages through which the perspectives of small groups or communities regarding the muted violence of the state, factory, or artificially created camps can be expressed. The cross-cultural perspective requires the reconsideration of notions about moral agencies in acts of violence, & is an important corrective to the atomized individual of much of social action theory. The Ponce Playa Project in Puerto Rico, officially known as the Centro Sister Isolina Ferré, is a community-based project originally designed for the prevention & correction of juvenile delinquency. It is also perceived as a successful grass-roots project that has effectively limited violence through the revitalization of the Ponce Playa community. The project is based on the principle that a community made aware of its own resources, with a confidence in its capacity to use these resources for its own fulfillment, will come alive & create a life more human & more satisfying for itself & the development of its children. Educational alternatives & job training have helped in the development of a sense of self-worth, youth & family advocacy & community health programs have resulted in a new vision of a people in control of their lives; an awareness of their capacity for mutual assistance has reawakened a sense of confidence. Ponce Playa has become an environment conducive to achievement rather than delinquency or violence. 1 Table. HA

Some potential factors affecting emotional arousal in response to media depictions of violence were investigated in an experiment involving Ms & Fs aged 17-24 from different racial & SE groups in New England: 72 white, suburban Coll students & 78 residents of a racially mixed, inner-city housing project. Ss' physiological & psychological responses to 10 videotaped film excerpts depicting 10 different forms of violence were recorded via measures of skin conductance, blood pulse volume, & questionnaires. Results of analyses of variance indicated no significant effects of either gender or personality factors (though gender did affect Ss' subjective ratings of approval for the films), while the main effects of SC were highly significant. Inner-city Ss were more aroused by all types of violence than were their Coll counterparts, with the greatest disparity between groups occurring in their responses to depictions of rape. Findings lend support to the theory of resonance, ie, when media content is congruent with real life experiences, a marked amplification of the reality of & identification with the media message occurs. 5 Tables, 2 Figures, 45 References. Aims and Scope

The European Journal of Personality is the official journal of the European Association of Personality Psychology. The journal promotes the development of empirical and theoretical personality psychology within Europe and elsewhere, by reporting and reviewing original research, theoretical issues, methodological advances and current experience.

It is intended that the journal will reflect all areas of current personality psychology. It emphasises:

- Human individuality as manifested in cognitive processes, emotional and motivational functioning, and personal ways of interacting with the environment.
- Individual differences in personality structure and dynamics.
- Studies of intelligence and interindividual differences in cognitive functioning.

Editorial Policy

The European Journal of Personality publishes original reports, theoretical analyses, methodological contributions, and critical review papers. The journal also publishes brief research notes and book reviews. Articles are in English and those which reflect a European tradition in personality psychology are encouraged. Each article is accompanied by summaries in English, German and French.

New Hampshire, Durham 03824), Sexual Climate and Reported Rape: A State-Level Analysis, Archives of Sexual Behavior, 1987, 16, 2, Apr, 107-123

¶ Interstate differences in rape rates are explored as a function of a state's sexual climate, i.e., its degree of sexual liberalism & pornographic magazine consumption. Using aggregated data from the 1972-1983 cumulative data file of the General Social Survey, 41 states are classified according to their degree of urbanization, youthfulness of M population, % of the M population age 15+ who are divorced &/or single, % of the population below the poverty line, & % black—all variables known to be related to higher incidences of rape & other violent crimes. A sexual liberalism index & circulation index for 8 sex magazines are also constructed, data on reported rapes are drawn from the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Uniform Crime Reports. Results indicate that states attaining high scores on the sexual liberalism & sex magazine circulation indices have higher rates of rape than do those with low scores, urbanization, poverty, & % of divorced Ms are also correlated with high rates of rape. However, multiple regression analyses indicate no relationship between liberal sexual attitudes alone & rape, suggesting that the link between pornography & rape may be stronger than has been previously assumed. It is recommended that additional research be conducted to analyze the nature & effects of the content of sexually explicit magazines & their depictions of violence & the sexual subordination of women. 2 Tables, 2 Figures, 1 Appendix, 19 References. Analysis of interview & record data indicates that the presence or absence of emotional neglect, family criminality, & a support system within & outside of the home, as well as the sex of the abusing parent & how parents resolve conflicts, are all important for understanding the relationship between child abuse & subsequent violent criminal behavior. 3 Tables, 92 References. Zapotec Indians in Mexico based on fieldwork experiences. Emphasis on the sociocultural mechanisms they have developed that help control interpersonal violence. Both primary & secondary effects of those mechanisms are discussed from the perspective of the theoretical significance of childrearing practices observed in the community. Two conclusions are drawn: (1) The system is delicately balanced between forces that limit socially sanctioned & limited expression of violence, & the control of behavior potentially provocative of hostility. (2) Despite this delicate balance of social forces, the system appears to function remarkably in support of a nonviolent way of life. Modified HA

¶ Social structural explanations for conflict, violence, & warfare are examined because there is, indeed, an association between the social organization of a society & the levels, targets, & techniques of conflict management it uses. At the same time, social-structural explanations are incomplete & fail to articulate how the "apparent" interests of social groups are converted into organized political action. Social-structural & psychocultural explanations of the aggressive behavior of the Maclellan, a tribal group of Papua New Guinea (based on Meggitt, M., Blood and Their Argument: Warfare among the Maclellan Tribesmen of the New Guinea Highlands, Palo Alto, Mayfield, 1977), are compared, illustrating that the failure to consider the psychological dimensions of social action on the empirical & theoretical levels renders many structural theories arbitrary & tautological. Stone's reliance on assize records, whose evidentiary imperfections he does not recognize & his interpretation of shifts in crime patterns as due to a shift from feudalism to capitalism—the shift from violence to theft being absent in period central to his argument (late sixteenth to early eighteenth century). In a Rejoinder, Stone (Princeton U, New Jersey) admits problems of evidence & interpretation, but argues that they do not impair the conclusion that homicide rates have declined dramatically or the significance of this decline for quality of life, & for real & perceived violence levels. ¶ A summary of the debate in UK sociology literature about the appropriate method of classifying women with family responsibilities in studies of SC & mobility. After outlining the treatment of women in postwar studies of British social mobility, recent empirical studies of women in the labor market are reviewed; women are typically found in lower-paid jobs with poor prospects in a limited number of industrial sectors. Protagonists agree that women's paid work usually provides secondary income because the gender DoFL in the household determines both the career of individual women & the overall opportunities available in the labor market. Class theorists (represented by J. H. Goldthorpe) are committed to occupationally based collectivities as "major vehicles" for social change, & resist approaches implying that SC affiliation can change with household circumstances. The class interest of a household must be that of the highest-status member, who is usually M. Critics reply that individuals' opportunities & behavior are the outcome of the aggregated aspirations, paid & unpaid labor of all members of the household, although there may be inequalities in the allocation & control of these resources. 28 References. ¶ The emergence & growth of the comparable worth movement in the US since 1980 signals a major shift in strategies for women's economic advancement—ie, from affirmative action aimed at job integration toward upgrading conditions for gender-segregated work itself. Archival & documentary evidence & interview data from 60 participants in 2 public school sector comparable worth cases in San Jose & Contra Costa County, Calif, are used to explore what the issue means to those involved & how they perceive their interests. As a political movement, comparable worth overcomes the narrow base of affirmative action, improving job conditions without attacking the gendered DoFL. However, it fails to unite all women, pits women against men of the same SC, & may exacerbate the plight of women in the lowest level of the economy. As an interim strategy, however, it is a worthy feminist goal, particularly as it addresses the concerns of Wc women. 57 References. Modified HA

¶ An analysis is presented of radical, reformist, & Marxist schools of feminist thought. In the first phase of feminist theory, which developed during the late 1960s & early 1970s, socially constructed differences between the sexes were viewed as the chief source of oppression of women. Feminist theory concentrated on the distinction between sex & gender & showed that sex roles form a mode of social control. In the mid-1970s, feminist theory abandoned the androgynous model in favor of a woman-centered perspective in which women were encouraged to overcome their previous conditioning & to seek areas of public life previously closed to them. This perspective, however, has led in some instances to a potentially reactionary concept of the moral superiority of women. During the 1980s, feminism must adapt to the political resurgence of the Right in many Western countries. 1 Table, 25 References. Modified HA

¶ The recent social history of the issue of pornography within the women's movement is traced, exploring reasons for the feminist entry into the pornography debates & the theoretical understanding that informed the first wave of campaigns, which were characterized by "take back the night" marches against pornography & violence against women. The early theoretical position is criticized for its lopsided, biological determinism & its revival of a crude behaviorist model of human behavior. This is contrasted with the various countervailing feminist positions that developed in response to the first wave of theory & practice. It is argued that these later contributions helped to broaden the initial analysis by calling attention to the ideological effects of pornography & redirecting attention away from excessive concentration on the conjunction of sex & violence in pornography & toward everyday images of women in the media (eg, advertising). These more recent insights are consolidated into a more sophisticated & less panic-stricken theoretical formulation of the feminist objection to pornography. The revised feminist objection to pornography is juxtaposed to those of the moral conservative & liberal pro-

* US feminists have consistently viewed prostitution as a social problem & opposed state-regulated or legalized prostitution. However, feminists in different eras have taken conflicting policy stands on the problem: progressive era feminists supported severe state suppression of prostitution, while contemporary feminists join prostitutes in support of decriminalization of the activity. Feminist writings are analyzed to compare feminist thought & organization in the two eras. It is suggested that this contradiction in policy positions is due to shifts in feminist thought about the state, particularly criminal sanctions, as well as changes in the organizing strategies of feminists. Implications are discussed for contemporary feminists contemplating policy stands that rely on legal sanctions as a strategy for prostitution control & facilitate alliances with moral crusaders to redress social problems. * The recognition accorded prominent women in GB underwent significant changes during the period 1860-1914, particularly in the shift from status to achievement. After examining F representation in such reference books as Men of the Time & Who's Who, an attempt is made to determine how & to what degree the public achievement of women was recognized. In some cases, the changes in F inclusion represented distinctive trends in the distribution of the activities of prominent women, including the emergence of journalists & MDs, in others, they reflected changes in M attitudes toward women & the new phenomenon of feminism. In still other instances, they represented changes in the criteria of prominence applied to women. Paradoxically, the recognition of women as reflected in reference books underscored their inferior status & the existence of a double standard. This double standard was, however, gradually eliminated as society began to recognize women not because they were prominent women but because they were prominent. 6 Tables, 1 Appendix. AA

* The relationship between death anxiety, age, developmental concern & SES is analyzed using interview data from 74 women aged 30-49 who had recently enrolled at a large midwestern U. D. Templer's death anxiety scale (see The Journal of General Psychology, 1970, 82, 165-177) & a thematic apperception test were used to measure attitudes about death. Concurrent & construct validation of direct & indirect measures of these attitudes yielded different, often complementary results. Factor analysis yielded 7 factors that accounted for 50% of the variance: death concern, death anticipation, death as loss, death in physical terms, death as depressing, death denial, & death as a dimension of time. Different variables were identified in the regression analysis as predicting these different factors; no variable predicted death as depressing. Overall, these findings show that death attitudes are multidimensional & are influenced by both SES & developmental factors. 2 Tables, 29 References. Modified HA

Over the past twenty-five years, more & more US women have been returning to school after a period of employment in the LF. Factors that make it likely that women will leave the LF to obtain more schooling, & whether this increase in education significantly improves their wage levels & job prestige when they return to work are investigated using employment history data from the National Longitudinal Survey of Labor Market Experience of Young Women, 1968-1973, (N = 3,638 white & 459 black Rs aged 14-24). The results of the initial analysis reveal that job rewards are an important influence on women's rates of returning to school. In addition, regression analyses demonstrate that women's return to school yields modest wage increases & increased occupational prestige (with certain exceptions) in subsequent jobs. Women who return to school are also more likely to improve the occupational category of their job, although usually they remain employed in gender-typical occupations. In general, additional schooling benefits women's occupational attainment, but, perhaps because of structural barriers, there are limitations to these benefits. 5 Tables, 26 References. Modified HA

1 The situation of women in the Middle East, particularly Muslim countries, is explored through an in-depth analysis of their place in Turkish society. It is argued that as an ideological system, Islam provides some unifying concepts that profoundly influence women's subjective experiences of femininity & subordination through various mechanisms. In particular, corporate & culturally defined modes of control over F sexuality, sex-segregated social networks with extensive informal support systems, & a continued valuation of women's nurturant roles over their life spans combine to shape & reproduce a culturally specific experience of gender that invokes a multitude of contradictions. Variations in women's experiences in different Muslim countries are shown to be due to differences in nationalist histories & social policies. Examination of the Turkish case reveals the importance of the political project of the state in shaping these experiences & producing women's self-definitions of "gendered subjects," despite outward manifestations of "liberation." The relevance & limitations of Western feminist approaches to analysis of the experiences of Middle Eastern women are evaluated. 1 Illustration. Modified AA

1 The variety of men's responses to feminism in the late nineteenth- & early twentieth-century US is examined through texts that addressed the claims raised by the turn-of-the-century women's movements. Antifeminist texts relied on traditional arguments, as well as social Darwinist & natural law notions, to reassert the patriarchal family & to oppose women's suffrage & participation in the public sphere. Masculinist texts sought to combat the purported feminization of US manhood by proposing islands of masculinity, untainted by feminizing forces, proscribed homosexuality was also cast as an effective antidote to homosexuality. Profeminist texts openly embraced women's claims for changes in public participation & private & family life, both out of a sense of justice & the conviction that such changes would benefit men & challenge the emerging industrial capitalist order. Parallels to contemporary men's responses to the women's movement are suggested. 74 References. HA

1 Multiple indices for evaluating the feminist challenge in psychology are identified, & provide a context for discussing selected aspects of research in personality & social psychology that reflect the impact of feminism on psychology. Women's involvement in the research process, the types of research methods used, & substantive concerns were examined in selected issues of the Journal of Personality & Social Psychology between 1963 & 1983 ($\Sigma N = 156$ articles). Despite a significant increase in the proportion of articles with F authors, there were no clear changes in any of the methodological variables assessed. Comparisons of some of these studies & those published in the Psychology of Women Quarterly (N = 59 & 27, respectively) suggest that the impact of feminist challenge is far more noticeable in this more explicitly feminist journal. Evidence pertaining to the relative impact of publishing in explicitly feminist vs "mainstream" journals, derived from analyses of citation (f of several feminist studies, was examined also. Overall, results suggest that feminist values may have affected research topics more than research methods within personality & social psychology. Several implications of this gatekeeping function of methodology are discussed. 3 Tables, 70 References. Modified HA

Helmreich (Masculinity and Femininity: Their Psychological Dimensions, Correlates, and Antecedents, Austin: U of Texas Press, 1978) found in the US, sex-typing effects were strong on all variables, with androgynous & masculine students scoring highest on self-esteem, mastery, work orientation, & competitiveness, & undifferentiated students scoring lowest. Sex-typing interacted with sex on the Attitudes toward Women scale. The effects were stronger among secondary school students than among U students. As in the US, sex differences were less marked than sex-typing differences, although there were fewer sex differences on these measures in Fiji than in the US. The importance of instrumental traits in achievement orientation & self-esteem was confirmed in a vastly different cultural settings, suggesting the possibility of pancultural generality of sex-typing effects. 4 Tables, 22 References HA

Coleman, Eli (U Minnesota, Minneapolis 55414). Assessment of Sexual Orientation. Journal of Homosexuality, 1987, 14, 1-2, fall-winter, 9-24.

¶ The basic assumption of most methods utilized to assess sexual orientation is that sexual orientation is determined by one's gender or genitalia & the gender or genitalia of the individual one is attracted to. This assumption is challenged, the complexity of sexual orientation is illustrated, & a model for assessment of sexual orientation is proposed that includes nine dimensions: current relationship status, self-identification identity; ideal self-identification identity; global acceptance of current sexual orientation identity, physical identity, gender identity, sex-role identity; sexual orientation identity as measured by behavior, fantasies, & emotional attachments; & the individual's past & present perception of sexual identity compared to idealized future identity. 2 Tables, 3 Figures, 30 References HA

¶ A review essay on books by: Sarah Fenstermaker Berk, The Gender Factory. The Apportionment of Work in American Households (New York: Plenum, 1985); Paula England & George Farkas, Households, Employment, and Gender: A Social, Economic and Demographic View (New York: Aldine, 1986); & Evelyn Nakano Glenn, Issei, Nisei, War Bride: Three Generations of Japanese American Women in Domestic Service (Philadelphia: Temple U Press, 1986 [see listings in IRPS No. 42]). These three works represent examples of a feminist scholarship that incorporates interdisciplinary conceptual frameworks to analyze gender, the household, women's work, & the links among them. Berk employs a nonclassical economic framework to quantitatively explore the allocation of household work among husbands & wives in 335 households. England & Farkas integrate sociological & economic theory in a synthesis of research on household & employment behavior, including divorce & fertility decisions, childrearing, marital power, & housework. Glenn profiles 3 generations of Japanese-American women who worked as domestic workers, relying largely on interview data collected from 48 such women in the San Francisco (Calif) Bay Area. The works are highly recommended to feminist scholars interested in women's work both in & outside of the household. K. Hyatt

¶ The problems with established sociological & social-psychological theories of masculinity are discussed, & it is argued that object-relations theory provides a clearer understanding of masculinity. An ideal type of the development of masculinity is proposed & then contrasted to similar ideal types of human development & the development of femininity proposed by feminist writers. The implications of the ideal type are drawn out for the relationship between psychoanalysis & sociological analysis & for social change. 38 References. Modified HA

¶ A general review of issues relating to the place of Fs in pastoral production, & an examination of the pastoral working process from the perspective of Fs. It is argued that a proper understanding of pastoral productive relations must be based on recognition of the dual nature of productivity in terms of utilities & of herd generation. The complex intertwining of different labor inputs, can lead to cultural underevaluation of Fs' work. Fs' rights to livestock & access to other resources that can give them bargaining power are discussed, & the direction of present changes in the lives of pastoral women are considered. 69 References. ¶ A sample of women (N = 24) who have used sex as a way of moving up within an organization is described using interview data. All were in positions in which they did very little work, received high wages, & attributed these circumstances to sexual affairs with a boss or bosses &/or clients of the company. The theoretical implications of adding the office harlot to the other forms of prostitution are discussed. 2 Tables, 15 References HA

¶ Human anatomy text illustrations were examined to determine whether medical students are shown both Fs & Ms as equally important & normal bodies in medical school instructional material. All 8 anatomy texts currently in use in a major western medical school were surveyed. In text sections dealing with standard (non-gender-specific) anatomy, M Ss were shown in 64% of the illustrations in which gender was discernible, Fs were shown in 11%, & gender-neutral or equal representations were shown in 25%. Fs & Ms were found to be represented approximately equally in chapters on urogenital (gender-specific) anatomy (45% Fs, 48% M, 7% neutral or equal representation). The implications of these findings for the perpetuation of sexist attitudes in the medical profession are discussed. 2 Tables, 1 Appendix, 11 References HA

¶ It is argued that comparable worth is a limited remedy for occupational segregation & the wage gap: it is compatible with meritocratic values, argued for in conventional labor market terms, & may increase tensions among M & F workers. Relying on liberal political discourse, it has also improved the wages of F workers, broadened public thinking about discrimination, & stimulated cross-gender wage comparisons. The limitations of comparable worth are explained in relation to a specific political agenda & to a historical & political struggle over control of the comparable worth debate. Social science advocates for a more radical political agenda must examine power & tactics in order to build a radical politics to accompany radical principles. 23 References. Modified HA

¶ The contribution of women's protests to the possible formation of a unified women's movement in Latin America & the political impact it could have are discussed. The rise of social movements is considered to have made explicit the complexity of the social dynamic. Social movements in general, & the feminist movement in particular, have opened up an alternative to the traditional practice of politics & have made possible a new self-conception of the public. The women's movement (taking Peru as an example) reflects the multiplicity of relations in which women live, in that their struggle centers around both traditionally domestic or private & public issues. The structure, demands, & strategies of the contemporary feminist movement in Peru are examined, & future tasks are outlined. J. Anderson

Three separate ideological groups have formed within the MLF: radical, socialist, & Marxist. Problems of cohesion among these factions & other political, institutional, & cultural obstacles confronting the MLF are discussed. Despite these, progress has been made toward the overall goal of raising consciousness & changing mentalities within French society; there have been successes in several major campaigns, including those in favor of abortion & contraception, of nonsexist education, & of legislative changes concerning divorce & other aspects of family life. ¶ The lives of contemporary Japanese women in Japan are explored with the purpose of: (1) providing an indigenous meaning for the structure, trajectory, & emotional content of their lives; (2) correcting commonly held Western stereotypes involving Japanese women; & (3) providing a basis for considering alternative directions in social development in modern societies. Case histories of a young mother & her middle-aged mother are presented, focusing on generational & historical differences between their lives, as well as on differences between their lives & those of European & US mothers. It is suggested that feminism has different cultural meanings & contexts; a universally appropriate model for women's lives is not likely to emerge. Modified AA

¶ An attempt is made to bring Swiss feminist research, especially in scientific fields, to the fore. In Repenser la subjectivité (Rethinking Subjectivity), Silvia Lempen-Ricci (chemin Fau-Blanc 20 H, CH-1009 Pully Switzerland) discusses the necessity of continuity in the relationship between method & content in research & draws parallels to such a connection between individuals (their subjective view) & their vision of the world (as expressed through any endeavor, eg. research). Subjectivity, it is argued, is the point of departure & reference for all human being while objectivity is primarily a male value. In Maisons closes et chambres à soi (Brothels and Rooms of One's Own), Thérèse Moreau (chemin Mallicu 9, CH-1009 Pully Switzerland) reviews sexism & feminism in literature, concluding with Henri Stendhal's notion that accepting the total equality of women would double humanity's intellectual force & the probability of happiness. In Lorsqu'un regard féministe se met à l'oeuvre... (When a Feminist Viewpoint Is Taken...), Anne-Marie Kappeli (chemin de Valérie 1, CH-1292 Chambésy Switzerland) discusses historically the slow development of feminist research, from the turn of the century, when studies of women dealt primarily with prostitutes, to the current view of feminism as a social rite of the bourgeoisie culture. ¶ Theda Skocpol (Harvard U, Cambridge, Mass) suggests that Sylvia Ann Hewlett (A Lesser Life. The Myth of Women's Liberation in America, New York: William Morrow & Co, 1986 [see listing in IRP No. 42]) raises issues that feminists need to consider even though she blames feminists for the current problems of US women. However, the true source of the problem is the absence of a US welfare state. In the absence of public programs for all citizens, feminists have been compelled to focus their efforts on affirmative action & reproductive rights. Joan D. Mandle (Pennsylvania State U, Delaware County campus) notes Hewlett's advocacy of special social support systems for women & her contention that feminism has failed to serve the distinctive needs of women. It is suggested that the women's movement could provide the political base for meeting women's needs more fully, though to do so it must concern itself with the needs of a wider spectrum of women. In a Reply, Sylvia Ann Hewlett argues that the women's movement in fact has shown little concern for child care or other social supports for working mothers & sees a basic opposition between feminism's advocacy of equal treatment & women's having distinctive needs as mothers. Ironically, government officials not identified with feminism have given much more support to the development of policy that resolves these problems than have feminists. 1 Reference. W. H. Stoddard

* The Kel Ferwan Twareg dwell in the Air mountains of Niger, where they live by keeping camels, cattle, sheep, & goats. Like the Kel Ahaggar, they have a highly stratified society. Focusing on contemporary conditions, illustrated is how gender inequality has different consequences for high status women & women from the servant groups, even though both these categories lead lives that are in sharp contrast to the mobile life of Twareg men. High status women have only limited independent control of livestock, compared to high status men, however, they have greater control over labor, since they "own" the F servants who give birth to more servants. The servant women, generally of slave descent, are constrained to menial work, while the woman of high status is able to make decisions & organize the work of others for her own profit. 2 Tables, 1 Map, 13 References. ¶ The expert testimony of psychiatrists played a major role in the case of surrogate mother Mary Beth Whitehead. This testimony displays substantial bias against Whitehead, treating normal mother-infant bonding as evidence of psychopathology, & ignores important issues that surround surrogacy. These aspects of the testimony reveal class & gender bias underlying the purported objectivity of medical science. In Comment on Harrison: The Commodification of Motherhood, Barbara Katz Rothman (Baruch Coll, City U of New York) sees the Whitehead case as reflecting a transformation of motherhood from a status to a service. Despite myriad changes in marriage & childbearing patterns & increased F employment outside the home, women are largely still expected to conform to the happy-mother-&housewife stereotype. It is argued that state intervention in family life has been a mixed blessing for women, providing financial support at the cost of continued patriarchal dominance. Ong, Aihwa (U California, Berkeley 94720), Disassembling Gender in the Electronics Age, Feminist Studies, 1987, 13, 3, fall, 609-626.

¶ A review essay on books by Ruth Schwartz Cowan, More Work for Mother: The Ironies of Household Technology from the Open Hearth to the Microwave (New York: Basic Books, 1983); Joan Rothschild (Ed), Machina Ex Dea: Feminist Perspectives on Technology (New York: Pergamon Press, 1983); Cynthia Cockburn, Brothers, Male Dominance and Technological Change (London: Pluto Press, 1983); Cynthia Cockburn, Machinery of Dominance: Women, Men, and Technical Know-How (London: Pluto Press, 1985); June Nash & Maria Patricia Fernandez Kelly (Eds), Women, Men, and the International Division of Labor (Albany: State U of New York Press, 1983 [see listings in IRPS No. 42]). Ways that technological changes have affected the paid & unpaid work experiences of women & meanings of gender in First & Third World countries are explored. It is argued that within a particular cultural milieu, the historically specific ways that capital uses technology to increase its power over workers promotes differential constructions of the gender-technology relationship worldwide. Each of these works casts doubts on the optimistic assumption that the new technologies would ease women's housework burdens while simultaneously increasing their employment opportunities & status. Rather, new technologies are shown to help perpetrate workplace sex segregation & F oppression, though in different ways than in the past. Cowan & Rothschild offer evidence that the US housewife is working harder than ever, but differ in their explanations for this & in the influence they attribute to capitalist factors, both however, fail to provide an understanding of the meaning that household technology has for the identity of US women. Cockburn's work examines a variety of newly computerized industries to explore how Ms retain power in the workplace through the control of technology. Nash & Kelly offer essays that explore the double-edged effects of new technologies in the Third World: though high technology allows for the large-scale transfer of paid employment to low-skilled Fs, it also discriminates against them in segmented labor markets & maintains their status as a cheap, disposable LF. It is argued that a comparative, cross-cultural perspective is needed to counter feminist assumptions about the technological reorganization of social relations & gender meanings & fully understand the complexities of women's changing status in the face of modern technology in both capitalist & peripheral nations. This Marxist influence came about as part of the radical sociological movement & the development of alternative sociologies during the 1960s & 1970s. During the 1980s, US Marxist sociology is undergoing paradigmization & diversification, leading to a search for a new methodological identity. ‡ Henry George, the US economist & social philosopher, considered it an anomaly that, under modern industrial conditions, progress & poverty should march together (Progress & Poverty, 1879). He recognized that the juxtaposition of wealth & want was a worldwide phenomenon & traced its cause to monopoly, particularly the monopoly of land & natural resources. Realizing that current taxes on consumption & production were disincentives to capital & labor, he proposed that governments tax the only true surplus, economic rent, through land value taxation. This would enable the people to reassert their common title to the land & the earth. His message was accorded a more favorable reception abroad than at home. Karl Marx wrote Das Kapital (1867) in England but it was George, not Marx, who appealed to the British workers. Yet it was Marxism that swept half the world into state socialism, conquering by political power & bayonet-Leninism while George's followers pursued the democratic approach of public education. HA

Lohmann, Georg, Marx's Capital and the Question of Normative Standards, ♦ Praxis International, 1986, 6, 3, Oct, 353-372.

‡ The question is raised of whether a theory of social evolution can be a critique-as Karl Marx's Das Kapital (1867) is intended to be-while incorporating Marx's critique of political economy as a subtheory. A distinction is drawn between immanent critique of capitalist society by its own standard of natural right & transcendent critique from some external standpoint-though which one Marx relies on remains less clear. It is argued that the historiographic passages of Das Kapital imply a historically situated transcendent critique, which is reconstructed here. This critique focuses on the historico-social lifeworld structures, contrasting the development of system-constitutive processes with their consequences for the historico-social lifeworld. However, extraction of a normative standard by which to judge lifeworlds requires a theoretically explicit formulation of norms that goes beyond the narrative structures of history. W H Stoddard

‡ A response to Jorge Larrain's "Three Different Concepts of Ideology in Marx" (see SA 33-2/8507557) & critique of his view on Marxian concepts of ideology & their relevance to current practical/social problems. It is argued that Marxist thought is applicable to the present not because it offers solutions to such problems, but because it provides insight into theoretical & practical dilemmas that radical theories have failed to resolve. Numerous examples are provided of how Larrain's understanding of Marx fails the requirement of textual adequacy & how his concept of ideology is flawed. Marx's ideas on the relation between science, classical political economy, & ideology are clarified, & implications on the contradictions in his later economic writings for understanding contemporary society are explored. Prego, Carlos A. (Facultad Ciencias Políticas y Sociales U Nacional Autonoma Mexico, 04510 Mexico DF), Lucio Colletti y el problema de la cientificidad del marxismo (Lucio Colletti and the Problem of the Scientific Status of Marxism), ♦ Revista Mexicana de Sociología, 1987, 49, 1, Jan-Mar, 33-51. (SPA)

‡ The philosophical thought of Lucio Colletti is analyzed. Three stages in its development are identified: the initial, classical period, dominated by the influence of Galvano Della Volpe (Il Marxismo e Hegel [Marxism and Hegel], 1958), a phase of transition (1969-1974); & Colletti's final works (Tra marxismo e no [Between Marxism and No], 1978; & Tramonto dell'ideologia [Beyond Ideology], 1980). The analysis focuses on three major themes: (1) ambiguities & limitations of the initial concept of science, (2) the difficulties that the presence of the valorative-programmatic element in the constitution of Marxian discourse presented for Colletti's interpretation, & the naturalist & determinist strategies that were used alternately by Colletti to assimilate that element in his own analytical scheme, & (3) the question of alienation & the related problem of dialectic inversion, in connection with which the closed, teleological-objective interpretation of Colletti's last works is contrasted with the axiological approximation that characterized the approaches of other Italian Marxist thinkers. The central question is the internal heterogeneity of Marxism & its character of synthesis, & the inadequacy of explanations that are openly or covertly "scientific." 43 References. Buehler, Cheryl (U Tennessee, Knoxville 37996-1900), Initiator Status and the Divorce Transition, UM Family Relations, 1987, 36, 1, Jan, 82-86.

† The effect of initiator status on emotional well-being, psychological well-being, & divorce-related stress at 2 points during the divorce transition is examined via questionnaire data from a representative sample of 80 divorced parents surveyed 6-12 months (T1) & 18-24 months (T2) postdecree. A major finding is that initiators & noninitiators have similar emotional responses to the divorce. However, the timing of the responses of these Ss differed. Initiators experienced more change, stress, & personal growth at T1, whereas noninitiators reported higher levels at T2. The implications of these timing differences for clinical & educational practice are explored. 2 Tables, 24 References. Modified HA

¶ Systems consultation is a theoretical framework that offers a new perspective for family therapy, a conceptualization that reminds the clinician to evaluate the different levels of a system relevant to a problem. In medical & other contexts, the term "family therapy" often implies family illness or pathology—a concept that often is unwanted by families themselves & by family-oriented professionals. The development of a systems consultation approach reflects the growth & refinement of family therapy & theory. 6 References

* A social ecological approach to consultation was evaluated through a 4-year primary prevention field research project with 10,000 people in 24 church congregations. Significantly lower levels of personal distress & alcohol abuse were found in experimental congregations exposed to intervention processes that encouraged an increase in heterogeneous settings & activities than were found in control congregations not exposed to the same intervention processes. Continuing reciprocal social support & mutual empowerment, defined as knowing how to give & receive support, caring for others, knowing others by name, & being asked to help others, were identified as the key process variables that minimized distress & abuse. 2 Tables, 4 Figures, 19 References. ¶ Perceptions of 4 dimensions of geriatric practice: the evocation of age-related countertransference issues, touch as particularly important, increased activity by practitioners, & the special value of reminiscence were examined via mail questionnaire among a sample of 541 subscribers to the Journal of Gerontological Social Work. The perception of the evocation of more age-related countertransference issues was associated with having a psychodynamic orientation, & with working in long-term care settings. The perception that increased activity is required with the elderly was associated with being 1 & with younger ages of practitioners. The perception of the special value of reminiscence was positively related to years of practice with the elderly, amount of formal education, & being 1. These modest, but understandable, associations should be substantiated, possibly through behavioral observations, in light of their implications for practice with the elderly. 5 Tables, 17 References. Albin, Peter S. (Center Study Systems Structure & Industrial Complexity John Jay Coll City U New York, NY 10019), Microeconomic Foundations of Cyclical Irregularities or 'Chaos', Mathematical Social Sciences, 1987, 13, 3, June, 185-214.

† Chaos phenomena, in which underlying deterministic processes give rise to unpredictable events, are identified within the sphere of economics. A microeconomic model derived from R. H. Day ("Irregular Growth Cycles," American Economic Review, 1982, 72, 406-414) is used to explain irregular macroeconomic behavior. One-dimensional cellular automata are used to simulate departures from equilibrium investment, yielding information on the likely behavior of the economy as a dynamic system. Plausible variations in business behavior support chaotic macrodynamics as well as two simpler types of behavior: uniformity over time & regular periodicity. The same economy can also produce behavior that is qualitatively richer than chaos & has more interesting expectational & economic implications: an apparent structural or regime change. Seemingly minor alterations in the parameters of a model microeconomy can shift the macroeconomy between these qualitative behaviors. 7 Figures, 49 References. Modified HA

† Questionnaire data from 471 chief executive officers of small business firms are analyzed to explore the relationship between entrepreneurship & small business management. Rs were divided into 2 groups: businesses managed by founders (entrepreneurs), & nonfounders (managers). Findings indicate that: 8 variables differentiate the groups according to personal & firm characteristics; entrepreneurial firms show higher growth rates, & hard-driving competitiveness is consistently associated with financial performance for small business managers but not for entrepreneurs. 4 Tables, 15 References. † Though business interests of modern societies have become so interconnected & interdependent that it has become impossible to understand them in conventional economic terms, it is difficult to specify precisely the nature of this global interconnectedness. It is shown that the emerging new rules of the global economy can only be understood in terms of a broader framework that takes paradox as its central ingredient. It is argued that the management of all phenomena that are global is equivalent to the management of paradox. 13 References. Modified HA

† Conventional wisdom accords deterrence a prominent role in the control of corporate crime. It is argued that current confidence in a deterrence strategy is unfounded, (1) because it is based on an unrealistic view of corporate decision making, & (2) because it makes an overly optimistic appraisal of the US legal system's capacity to control corporate conduct through punitive means. It is further argued that efforts to increase the sanctions imposed on corporate offenders may produce unintended consequences that would increase, rather than lessen, the victimization resulting from corporate wrongdoing. "Penetrating" legal controls, such as incapacitation & rehabilitation, are proposed as preferable alternatives. 71 References. HA

† Corporate interlocks among West Germany's 325 largest companies are analyzed, using an available database for 1976. Besides capital links (through shareholding), two types of personnel interlocks are defined: directed links (created by persons with an executive function in firm A & a control function in firm B), & elite links (induced by linkers with 4+ board memberships, but without executive function). In a first step, economically dependent corporations are grouped together with majority shareholders. The blockmodel analysis of the resulting groups of corporations with regard to capital links & directed & elite personnel links shows that: (1) there is a split between a large group of private firms & the public sector of the economy, & (2) the private sector is further differentiated, & has a powerful center that is dominated by the two largest banks (Deutsche & Dresdner Banks). These results support the thesis of bank hegemony but not the stronger thesis of bank control. The structural integration is stronger than predicted. The West German corporate structure seems to be a social system in its own right. 8 Tables, 2 Figures, 33 References. Modified HA

Rosecrance, John (U Nevada, Reno 89557), Bookmaking: A Case Where Honesty Is the Best Policy, JM Sociology and Social Research, 1987, 72, 1, Oct, 7-11

† Whatever the climate of honesty in legal businesses, one expects a lower level of integrity in an illegal business. Yet, interview data from 92 gamblers & 6 bookmakers around the US reveal that illegal bookmakers are constrained to be scrupulously honest in dealing with their customers; failure to do so results in immediate loss of business. Thus, self-interest leads to a high ethical level. 1 Table, 15 References. Modified HA

While the documentary tradition in photography is long established, its boundaries & its status as "evidence" remain unclear. Questions relating to photography as a discourse between the photographer, the subject of the photograph, & the viewer are discussed in the light of the representation of work by photographs. By considering the various ways in which work has been portrayed, & how photographs depicting work can be interpreted, the problematic status of the photographic document becomes clearer. The various traditions of work-related photography are traced & the issues raised in reading or decoding the work images are outlined. Two photographs are examined in detail. Photographs can represent highly valid sources of social scientific information, but only if the circumstances of the photograph's creation, how the photograph was taken, for whom, & for what purpose, etc. are known. 2 Photographs, 25 References. AA

Revue québécoise
de linguistique

La Revue québécoise de linguistique fait suite aux Cahiers de linguistique de l'Université du Québec, fondés en 1971.
Quinze ans de publication ininterrompue.

Revue à caractère scientifique, son objectif principal est de promouvoir et de diffuser surtout en français les travaux de linguistique qui traitent des langues parlées au Québec, et qui apportent une contribution significative à la caractérisation et au fonctionnement des langues naturelles.

La Revue québécoise de linguistique paraît deux fois l'an. Chaque numéro est axé sur un thème principal, mais comporte également d'autres sections.

La haute qualité scientifique du contenu est assurée par un comité permanent de sélection composé de spécialistes reconnus dans différentes disciplines linguistiques et provenant d'universités ou de centres de recherche canadiens, américains et européens.

La collection complète des Cahiers de linguistique et de la Revue québécoise de linguistique est disponible à prix spécial avec un abonnement; on peut aussi commander séparément les numéros déjà publiés.

Dear Research Committee Participant:

This is the second SA Supplement published for an ISA Research Committee Meeting.

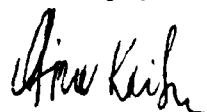

It is generally agreed that it would be helpful to the profession if not only the abstracts, but the papers they summarize, were made available to the vast user audience (about 150,000 people) that SA commands in print. In addition, the online version of SA is available to information professionals in the U.S. through BRS (file label SOCA) and Dialog (file 37), in Switzerland through Data-Star (file label SOCA), and in the Federal Republic of Germany through DIMDI (file label to be determined). Subject specialists can access SA on three user-friendly services; BRS's After Dark and Colleague (file labels SOCA) and Dialog's Knowledge Index (file SOCSI).

Each abstract for which the original paper has been made available for reproduction through SA's Document Delivery Service is prominently noted, and ordering instructions are provided.

Making papers available in no way limits copyright, which remains in the hands of the author unless he or she relinquishes those rights in writing. SA lays no copyright claim to the paper. The author may submit the paper for publication, and may edit it before such submission. If the paper is published, SA requests that the first footnote indicate that the paper was presented at the ISA/RCHS meeting of a given year, that the paper has been made available through the SA Document Delivery Service, and that an abstract is in the SA database under a given accession number. The author may withdraw his/her paper from the SA service with 30 days written notice. Royalties are, of course, paid all authors on all sales.

We look forward to an exciting and informative Research Committee meeting.

Cordially yours,

This supplement is presented to all registrants of the 1988 International Sociological Association, Conference of the Research Committee on the History of Sociology with the compliments of the Secretariat of the Research Committee (08) and the collaboration of sociological abstracts (SA).

The numbering of the abstracts has been integrated into a continuous supplements acquisitions number series. For example, the first abstract, that of a paper by Mogens Blegvad, is numbered as follows:

88S20143/ISA-RCHS-08/1988/0001

88 stands for the designation of year of presentation. S20143 is the first supplement abstract number following from supplement No. 149. The accession number is followed by an abbreviation of the conference name and the year in which the meeting is held; the last number indicates that it is the first abstract SA has published for the Research Committee (08) Conference.

Blegvad, Mogens (Soldalen 7, DK-2100 Copenhagen 0 Denmark). The Problem of Commensurability of Values in Weber, Simmel and Pareto.

* As a result of the development of economic value theory, & also of the neo-Kantian trends in late-nineteenth-century philosophy, the project of developing a general theory of value emerged around 1900 in Austria & in Baden, Germany. If economic value in accordance with this project is considered a species of value, coordinate with other species such as ethical or aesthetic value, the question of its relation to these leads to a general problem of the commensurability of the different species of value. Max Weber encountered this question in his study of agrarian society east of the Elbe & dealt with it in his inaugural lecture in Freiburg, in 1894. In his later methodological works, he argued for a general incommensurability thesis, which is very important in relation to his conception of rationality. Weber was strongly influenced by the neo-Kantian philosopher Heinrich Rickert, not only in his theory of concept formation, but also in his theory of value. Georg Simmel also dealt with the commensurability problem in his Philosophy of Money after having consulted Rickert. For Vilfredo Pareto, whose theory of value was of the subjectivistic kind, the problem became that of comparing the "opfelements" of different individuals. His conclusion was that they are incommensurable, but that meaning can be given to the expression "maximum utility of a community."

Bulmer, Martin (London School Economics, Houghton St Aldwych WC2A 2AE England). The Social Survey in Britain and the United States before 1940: A Pattern of Divergence.

* The late nineteenth- & early twentieth-century social survey played a critically important role in the establishment of empirical sociology. The early British poverty surveys of Charles Booth & Seebohm Rowntree found ready followers & imitators in the US, but the social survey movement in the US in the first quarter of the twentieth century embodied a distinctively different conception of systematic social inquiry as a means of local social action & the illumination of PO. After systematically comparing the contributions of Booth & Rowntree with those of their US followers such as W. E. B. DuBois & Florence Kelly, the social survey movement is contrasted with contemporary British survey research by statistician A. I. Bowley, who first used probability sampling, & several studies of interwar social conditions in GB by Hubert I. Jewell-Smith, Caradog Jones, Henry Mess, & others. Distinctive differences in terms of sponsorship, personnel, & audience are identified, as are significant divergences in the relationship between survey research & academic sociology of the period.

Chall, Leo P. (Sociological Abstracts Inc, PO Box 22206 San Diego CA 92122-0206). The Ranking of Sociology Journals.

* Two tables are presented & discussed, showing how English-language serial publications in sociology were ranked in the US in 1971 & 1982, respectively. The 1971 ranking, published in the American Sociologist (see SA 20.4/72F5864), included 64 journals chosen & categorized by chairpersons of sociology departments in US & Colls throughout the US. The 90 serials in the 1982 ranking were selected through a poll of editors of sociology journals. Seeking to spark an interest in studying the medium through which most sociology is disseminated i.e. serial publications—several questions are posed: (1) How & why do sociologists become editors? (2) What are the criteria for manuscript selection? (3) How are referees selected? (4) How do serials published by voluntary associations differ from those produced with venture capital? (5) Is US sociological literature circumscribed only by political borders or by substantive interests, network membership, &/or editorial authority? (6) Do citation patterns cross linguistic, national, & cultural borders? These & other questions deserve serious consideration. Even more important, however, is recognition that assessing the direction of a nation's sociology on the basis of a few elite journals is not just poor, but ludicrous, methodology.

Desrosieres, Alain (INSEE/FHFS, 18 blvd Adolphe-Pinard F-75675 Paris France). La Partie pour le tout: comment generaliser? La Prehistoire de la contrainte de representativite (The Part as a Section of the Whole: How to Generalize The Prehistory of Representativity). (FRE)

* A basic problem of the empirical social sciences is discussed: how to assign a general significance to observations of a small number of cases, or of a sample of a population. Generally, one of two approaches has been taken: (1) "exemplary" or "typical" monographs; or (2) "representative" samples, according to sampling techniques based on the calculation of probability. The latter technique was not widely used until about 1930, although its mathematical bases were familiar from the eighteenth century onward. Reasons for this delay are investigated by tracing the development of surveys of the We & of poverty, & the ways in which these problems were treated. The early focus on family & local conditions, as found, eg. in the exemplary monographs of Le Play, became obsolete with the spread of industrialization & urbanization in the late nineteenth century, followed by the emergence of the welfare state. A national perspective & hence, uniformity of data became necessary. The greater appropriateness of either the quantitative or the qualitative method for different types of study is discussed.

Ehsanullah, Mohammad (c/o Vakil Ahmad Light House, Chowk Azamgarh City Uttar Pradesh 276001 India). Peasant Production and Agrarian Relation: East U.P. in the Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Centuries.

* An attempt is made to highlight the role of sugarcane cultivation in agricultural production & surplus appropriation in the Gorakhpur region of eastern Uttar Pradesh (UP), India, in the colonial period. After exploring conditions under which the reproduction of small peasant economies came to be dependent on cultivation of sugarcane for the market, examined is the integration of cane cultivation in Gorakhpur first with the distant sugar refineries of Kanpur, & then with the local sugar mills. Different facets of the relationships between capitalist India, the dominant Ru SCs, & a dependent peasantry are analyzed in a Marxian framework using published historical evidence. Two of the main characteristics in sugar production in the area during the colonial period were clearly in evidence by the late nineteenth century. The regional economy showed a ready response to the pull of the distant markets, but the financial & institutional mechanisms through which it reached the peasantry created a complex web of dependency relationships for peasant producers. It was not the agency of commercialization but the process & relation of production in the countryside that provided the material conditions for this phenomenon of dependent agriculture.

Ellenon, Sven (Dept History U Uppsala, Saint Larsg 2 S-752 20 Sweden). Max Weber and the Secularization of Social Science.

* Max Weber is neither a genuine classic, innovating any new paradigm, nor a contemporary guide to modern social science; but he is a central character in the history of social science doctrine. His thought represents a condensation of the intellectual tensions of his time, & it inspired several later approaches. Many a social scientist has tried to pose as Weber, whose methodology, i.e. his ideal-type, has been subject to remarkably different interpretations by modern paradigm gurus. Weber's methodological appearance in 1904 is viewed in this context, especially his famous essay on objectivity in social science. Taking as a point of departure the Methodenstreit (method dispute) between history & theory, Weber combines different currents in the most elaborate presentation of his ideal-type to be found. His contribution to the controversy is a neo-Kantian-inspired solution to the problem of how to bring about intersubjective, testable abstraction in concept formation. Weber might be conceived of as a significant manifestation of the secularization of social science—a long trend starting with Machiavelli, & leading to modern public choice. Calculability & antinatural law are the central elements, with rational economic man as the common metaphor.

derstand one of the major political movements of the century: fascism. In so doing, they also revealed some uncomfortable principles of human nature & social life. The major sociopolitical developments of the twentieth century are best understood by reference to four fundamental myths, articulated around the ideas of four French authors: race (Joseph-Arthur de Gobineau), the crowd (Gustave Le Bon), violence (Georges Sorel), & selectionism (Vacher de Lapouge). What is important about these notions is their irrational appeal & the mystique that surrounds them, which, when properly manipulated, explain their social power. What really matters for an understanding of the twentieth century is not the myths in isolation but their special blending in a homogenized ideological package, of which Nazi Germany was the classical case.

* An exploration of the interpretations of Emile Durkheim by Talcott Parsons (The Structure of Social Action, New York: Free Press, 1937 [see SA 16 3/68D0525]), Jeffrey C. Alexander (Theoretical Logic in Sociology, Vol. 2, London: RKP, 1982 [see IRPS No. 13, 82c00142]), Richard Munch (Theorie des Handelns [Theory of Action], Frankfurt: Suhrkamp, 1982), & Jürgen Habermas (Theorie der kommunikativen Handelns [Theory of Communicative Action], Frankfurt: Suhrkamp, 1982 [see IRPS No. 41/87c00922 & 87c00923]). It is suggested that these contain one-sided, biased, or simply defective interpretations, the misreadings being the outcome of paradigmatic differences between Durkheimian sociology & the modern sociology of action. The merits of a rigorous "historical" contextual reading are acknowledged. However, analysis of the symptomatic differences between the Durkheimian & action sociological programs may throw light on the theoretical dilemmas of modern sociology. These dilemmas center around the problem of action & structure as conceptualized according to the special orientation of the theory in question.

Platt, Jennifer A. (Dept Sociology U Sussex, Falmer Brighton BN1 9QN UK). The Social Research Nexus in Pre-War Chicago: Same Research, Different Interests?

* Between WWI & WWII, considerable social research was done in the Chicago, Ill., area. Some of this is remembered as sociology, & some is not; some of it was conducted by professional sociologists, & some by social & settlement workers, local government organs, & rich amateurs. There were high levels of cooperation between the sociologists & the others, each to some extent dependent on the other, & it is arguable that the sociologists were the more dependent. It is not surprising, therefore, that research done under different auspices & for different purposes often looks very similar. The question of the extent to which research done for "knowledge" differed from that done for "action" is addressed in an attempt to account for the divergent histories of this body of work.

* Between 1951 & 1961, the Ford Foundation gave 252 grants totaling $38,493,716 to 85 institutions. Apart from 12 grants for the purchase of heavy equipment ($500,000+), these went to medium-length research projects & individual support for the most distinguished researchers. The foundation's program of action, drawn up in 1949, refers directly to the program for the behavioral sciences, which should contribute both to strengthening this interdisciplinary field of research & to the solution of social problems. Conflicts over decisions within the Foundation & between it & the academic milieu, as well as between the interests of application & the traditions of the discipline, prefigure the inevitable tensions in all social science policy, but also point to inherent ambiguities in the conception of "behavioral sciences."

Satyannarayana, Atluri (Dept Psychology U Allahabad Uttar Pradesh 211002 India). Interest Articulation: The Genesis of Agricultural Price Commission in India.

* Numerous social forces contributed to the genesis of the Agricultural Price Commission (APC) in India in 1965. Food price policy had been largely Ur consumer-oriented, with some restraints on prices from the 1943 Bengal famine to 1964. When the APC came into existence, it brought a crystallization of food price policy with assurance of supported prices for cultivators, even under conditions of food riots & mass demonstrations against the soaring prices in Ur areas. This policy was made possible through the alignment of industrialists with industrial workers & the Ur service class against traders, hoarders, & speculators. The terms of US food imports under PL 480 became more stringent in Lyndon Johnson's tenure as president, with emphasis on hard currency payments, an open door to private US investors in Indian industry, & a shift of emphasis from industrialization to agricultural development, which had a significant role to play in this change of policy.

Segre, Sandro (U Bocconi, Via Sarfatti 25 I-20136 Milan Italy). Weber's and Sombart's Theories of Western Capitalistic Development.

* A reconstruction of, & comparison between, Max Weber's & Werner Sombart's theories of the development of Western capitalism. In the early stage of development, both theories point to certain necessary conditions: a stratum of entrepreneurs, a large free L.F., some technical advancement in bookkeeping, law, & manufacturing, & the formation of a mass market. They differ, however, on some crucial points: (1) state promotion of capitalist interests & creation of an adequate monetary basis were viewed by Sombart as prerequisites for economic development, while Weber saw state policy as directly influenced by capitalist interests & conditioned by the social & legal organization of labor relations (Arbeitsverfassung); (2) the entrepreneurial stratum was defined by Sombart chiefly in cultural terms, linked to changes in the political & economic milieu; in Weber's opinion, these cultural traits did not characterize the specific ethos, shaped by Calvinism, of Western entrepreneurship. As for the mature stage of capitalist development, Weber stressed a spirit of acquisition & innovation in technological knowledge, in the administrative & political institutions, & in the modern business firm. The formation of bourgeois wealth, investment capital, & a mass market were viewed by Sombart as consequences of the unfolding & externalization of this spirit. In the last stage of capitalism, since 1900, the entrepreneurial function has been taken over by management, & constrained by the state & the unions. To Sombart's ideal typical reconstruction of developmental stages, Weber objected that it failed to consider the specific element of Western capitalism, namely, the organization of labor relations, which Weber considered a precondition of the rational organization of the modern capitalist firm. Since Sombart did not perceive the crucial relevance of this element, his theory failed to distinguish between capitalism in general & modern Western capitalism, some of whose most salient & specific features remain therefore unexplained.

Szreter, Simon R. S. (Gonville & Caius Coll, Cambridge CB2 1TA England). An Empirical Model of Social Classes in Inter-War Europe and America.

* The interwar period saw the emergence in the official census statistics of both GB & the US of a similar model of the nation's social structure: a unidimensional grading of six categories of social groups/classes. Possible reasons for this apparent similarity are probed: shared origins or mimesis, functional equivalence, or simply coincidence. By contrast, French official statistics do not exhibit this particular representation of society, either before or after WWII. Various explanations for such differences in the official empirical sociology of each country are considered.

Takeshi, Ohgane (Iwaki Meisei U, Chuodanno 5-5-1 Iwaki 970 Fukushima Japan). Sociology at the Turn of the Century: The Case of Simmel.

* The primary tasks of German sociologist & philosopher Georg Simmel were to establish sociology itself, & to illuminate the individual-society relationship. The corresponding problems of those two tasks were, respectively, that of form, & that of the nature of the modern individual. An attempt is made to show the significance of his work & what problems it poses or resolves for us today. Simmel adhered to a functionalist viewpoint in his thought, following the trend of the times. It is argued that functionalism is closely related to the phenomenon of urbanization as a result of industrialization, & this was the source of Simmel's philosophical & sociological imagination. It is also argued that the Simmelian individual is the whole man, who creates his own unity, & who thus makes criticism of society possible. These are the main ideas addressed in Simmel's sociology, seen in relation to the times in which he lived.

Gerhardt, Uta (Med Soziologie U Giessen, Friedrichstr 24 D-6300 Federal Republic Germany), Parsons' Models of Illness and Theory of Society: Some Notes on the Early History of Medical Sociology.

¶ It has not been recognized widely that Talcott Parsons's The Social System (Glencoe, Ill: Free Press, 1951) contains but one chapter that elaborates how an empirical use of his taxonomic meanders could be envisaged, & that medical practice is taken as that prototype. His use of the systems idea to elucidate the MD-patient relationship is not originally Parsons's, but that of his mentor Lawrence K. Henderson, who first ventured it in the Harvard "Pareto Circle." Parsons presents two explanatory models of illness, one relying on action theory, & the other on psychoanalysis: the latter contains a notion of deviance & social control, & the former uses a role concept of MD & sick role complementarity. Both models are intimately connected with the intellectual scene of the 1930s & 1940s. Parsons recognized psychoanalysis in the 1930s, & during the 1940s, he incorporated the two emergent conceptions of illness into his views on how democratic (modern) & nondemocratic (fascist) societies function.

¶ An analysis of the department of social legislation, one of three departments of the Forschungsinstitut für Sozialwissenschaften in Cologne, during 1928-1933 in Weimar Germany. Contrary to the two other departments, the social legislation department could expand its research activities in quality as well as in quantity, despite the worldwide economic crisis & the breakdown of the political system of the Weimar Republic. The Forschungsinstitut focused on a vision of a harmonious integration of society, according to the Catholic corporate doctrine. This doctrine converged with an ideological stream becoming dominant in society at the end of the Weimar Republic, whereas the two other departments—one social democratic, & the other liberal—lost impetus because they were closely linked to the dispute between We organizations & the entrepreneurial Me. The discussion illustrates the close link between trends in empirical social research & society at large.

Hallmann, Jost (U Osnabrück, FB I Postfach 44679 D-4500 Federal Republic Germany), The Concept of Critique in Sociological Theory. The Challenge of Modern Systems Theory for Critical Sociology.

¶ Critical sociology as exemplified by Max Horkheimer's essay "Traditional and Critical Theory" bases its argument on three claims: (1) concrete individuals can be looked at as (incomplete, alienated) subjects; (2) the critique of the social conditions for incomplete subjectivity of actors is derived from the idea of a future societal order in which all individuals can be subjects, & (3) the truth claim of critical theory can authoritatively guide the learning process of the social actors. A systems-theoretical concept of society can be based on three assumptions with regard to the notion of critique: (A) Social scientific theories can make truth claims only if they start from the distinction between social scientific & social actors' observations of society; (B) While social actors may view themselves as subjects, social science will have to start from more complex & abstract basic categories, eg, "action system" (Talcott Parsons) or "communication" (Niklas Luhmann); concrete individuals are "eccentric" elements of sociological concepts of society; (C) Social scientific truth claims are restricted to the system of scientific knowledge, neither social actors nor social science can control or guide the respective learning processes. The concept of critique in critical theory is geared toward uncovering what Horkheimer termed the "riddle" of alienated modern society. The concept of critique in social systems theory is geared toward "enlightening" the social actors to the fact that they cannot be subjects if they want to change the social conditions of their actions. The notion of critique in social systems theory restores the freedom of social choice (coupled with a loss of certitude about the consequences of social intervention), which critical theory's trust in the truth & legitimacy of its analysis has denied the social actors.

¶ The formation of sociology in the eighteenth & nineteenth centuries institutionalization of sociology in the twentieth century seems to be linked with their increasing entwinement. In the postwar welfare state sociologists have become involved with governmental policies, with far-reaching consequences not only for the public function, but also for the scientific form, of their discipline. This coherence between external & internal functioning of sociology is analyzed in detail using a case study: the development of Dutch sociology of education, related to political debates about unequal educational opportunities in the Netherlands. Some general conclusions are drawn concerning the sociologist's margins between science, politics, & the public sphere.

¶ Viewing the origins & development of early German sociology in the context of German political culture allows a sociological analysis that avoids the simplistic assumption of an integration of sociological thinking into a presupposed Zeitgeist. Such an analysis, however, leads to new difficulties, resulting from the problematic state of the paradigm of political culture. The relation of Germany's political culture & early sociology can be viewed as follows: a specific & relevant sector of the general political culture was reflected in early German sociologists' conceptions of society & its future; however, early German sociology, in turn, influenced & shaped the development of political culture, through popularization of sociological terms & concepts regarding society & its development.

Kettler, David & Meja, Volker (Dept Political Studies Trent U, Peterborough Ontario K9J 7B8), The Reconstitution of Political Life. The Contemporary Relevance of Karl Mannheim's Political Project.

¶ Contemporary political theory has given up on the conjunction between reason & revolution. Even critical thinkers opposed to socially dominant forms of knowledge & conduct are no longer looking for abrupt transformative transcendences in thought or practice. The linguistic turn in critical theory, for instance, precludes totalistic negations, & it entails recognizing rationality in the constitutive social knowledge of the existing order & therefore implies recognizing problems in communication & exchange between the established & the desired order of things. No one any longer hopes for totality. Instead of tracking dialectical consciousness to a point of total overturn, critical theorists speak of recovering a place for continuous & cumulative predominant patterns. There is renewed need to address problems of foundations in a critical theory, problems of compromise in a conflict theory, & problems of institutionalization in a dynamic theory. Examined here is one type of alternative that continues to be generally dismissed—the theoretical strategy developed in the critical days of Weimar Germany by the socialist-oriented thought of the republican Left. The evidence concerning Karl Mannheim's political commitments suggests that his primary audience & reference group were persons close to the Social Democratic Party, & that his theoretical work was directed primarily toward reconstituting the German political world. Comparison with a similar effort made by a group of Social Democratic labor lawyers shows both surprising parallels & instructive differences. It is argued that Mannheim construed the Weimar political complex prior to 1930 as a model for a dynamic mediating structure. He attempted to circumvent the political impasse brought about, in his view, by ideological polarization & mutual distrust, without relying on a rationalist homogenization of differences, but seeking instead to reconstitute the "situation" for political discourse. Mannheim caught the attention of the public he sought to address with his political project, but it ended in misunderstanding. However, it is suggested that today he is too easily dismissed by those who are faced with a problem constellation more similar to his intellectual situation in 1930 than they are prepared to admit.

Treibel, Annette (Fakultät Sozialwissenschaft Ruhr-U Bochum, Universitätsstr 150 D-4630 1 Federal Republic Germany). Sociology between Involvement and Detachment: Development and "Level of Detachment" in West German Sociological Research on Migration.

¶ An attempt is made to analyze the sociological discipline of migration research, particularly in West Germany. Using Norbert Elias's concepts of involvement & detachment, which he stressed as tools of thinking & as basic principles of social & scientific development (Involvement and Detachment, Oxford Blackwell, 1987), a new research model is outlined. Research on migration (not only in West Germany) has been criticized for lack of theoretical & methodological explication, lack of institutionalization & scientific autonomy, & neglect of historical & international comparisons. These deficits seem to be typical of social research oriented primarily toward practical-eg, educational, administrative, or political purposes. The historical development & the metatheoretical "level of detachment" of West German sociological research on migration are tested by means of a quantitative classification of studies conducted 1955-1958 & a qualitative content analysis of representative texts. The empirical & metatheoretical results, eg, the fluctuations of "level of detachment" during the different periods, do not verify the critical assumption that West German sociological research on migration has always been highly deficient; it has, however, often been emotionally & politically involved, & has seldom involved long-range study.

Turner, Stephen P. (U South Florida, Saint Petersburg 33701-5016), Giddings as the True Father of American Sociology.

¶ If one thinks of the history of US sociology as a paternity suit, & considers that the basic character of conventional sociological research practice was largely developed by 1935, the suspects for fatherhood are few. F. H. Giddings is the obvious choice, with respect to three key issues: his handling of the problem of the relation of theory to research, the correlational character of ultimate scientific knowledge in sociology, & the doctrine that theoretical variables may be measured by a variety of indices that correlate imperfectly with the variable to be measured. The Pearsonian origins of these ideas, & an exemplary piece of Giddingsian empirical-theoretical reasoning from his 1901 book Inductive Sociology are discussed. The problematic Giddingsian conception of the role of "uncontrolled experiment" is considered, & its later emergence from the subordinate role assigned to it by Pearson & Giddings is examined.

Wolff, Kurt H. (58 Lombard St, Newton MA 02158), Anomie and the Sociology of Knowledge, in Durkheim and Today.

¶ For Emile Durkheim, sociology was the answer to anomie; for Kurt Mannheim, this answer was the SoFK; here, it is suggested that the answer is found in the idea of surrender-&-catch. The reasons for these different responses are sought in the different times in which they were developed. These reasons are identified, in oversimplified fashion, as follows: for Durkheim, it was what he perceived in social organization as aberrations in the organic DoFL; for Mannheim, it was what he perceived in epistemology as the problem of universal truth; today, it is the survival of humanity & its habitat, which the idea of surrender-&-catch has been developed to support.

This is the 42nd number of the new IRPS series. Presented herewith are 30 book abstracts and a listing of 1,570 book reviews that appeared in the series SA abstracted in Volume 36 Number 2.

Book reviews are numbered with a five-digit number with a letter "a" as a prefix, and book abstracts are numbered with a five-digit number and a letter "c" as a prefix.

Each issue has three indexes: a reviewer index, a source publication index, and a book authors and other contributors index.

For core sociology journals, all reviews published are listed here. For non-core journals, only those reviews are listed which represent books written by sociologists, or fall within a sociological area of interest. In some cases, the reviewer's attitude toward the book reviewed is assessed and noted as (++) Very Favorable, (+) Favorable, (0) Noncommittal, (-) Unfavorable, or (--) Very Unfavorable.

Readers of IRPS have been aware that, worldwide, there are three serials devoted primarily to reviewing books published by and for sociologists. These are:

Contemporary Sociology, published by the American Sociological Association (1722 N Street NW, Washington DC 20036)

SeleSociologia, published by Gianfranco Morra (Via Belle Arti 42, 40126 Bologna, Italy)

Soziologische Revue, under the editorship of Johannes Weiss of the Gesamthochschule Kassel FB5 (Heinrich-Platt-Strasse 40, 3500 Kassel, Federal Republic of Germany)

Effective with the No. 26 IRPS issue, Soziologische Revue has been added to the book review bibliography. Since all non-English language book titles have been translated into English, for all intents and purposes, a definitive bibliography of books published by and for sociologists in the Western world is now available for English-reading users.

We also wish to point out that reviewing sections have declined in major core sociology serials, and a new medium the 'newsletter,' is gradually entering the void thus created. Every effort is being made to locate newsletters that carry book reviews, and secure permission to have the reviews listed in the IRPS. We welcome information as to where and by whom such newsletters are published.

Aldous, Joan [Ed] (Dept Sociology U Notre Dame, IN 46556), TWO PAYCHECKS: LIFE IN DUAL-EARNER FAMILIES, 247pp, no index, Beverly Hills, CA Sage Publications, Inc., LC 82-10538, ISBN 0-8039-1882-8

Cloth, $24.00 Paper, $12.00

* This collection of essays, some of which appeared in a special issue of Journal of Family Issues (1981, 2, 2, June), concerns the characteristics of dual-earner families & the ways in which having two earning spouses affects the structure & roles of the family, in IV PARTS & 12 Chpts. PART I - OVERVIEW - provides basic information on the past & present of dual-earner families, along with speculation about the character of a future society in which they can occur freely, & includes (1) Joan Aldous - From Dual-Earner to Dual-Career Families and Back Again summarizes the recent history of dual-earner families, provides a rationale for use of the term, & previews the subsequent articles, (2) Howard Hayghe Dual-Earner Families: Their Economic and Demographic Characteristics supplies a current picture of two-earner families & their systematic variation, concluding with a discussion of elderly & child-care issues, & (3) Janet G. Hunt & Larry I. Hunt Dual-Career Families: Vanguard of the Future or Residue of the Past? challenges the usual positive view of two-earner families, pointing to the lack of change in economic organizations to accommodate the needs of families, & provides a typology of couples as traditionalists, prioritizers, or integrators. PART II - THE INTERDEPENDENCE OF OCCUPATIONS AND FAMILIES - contains (4) Joseph H. Pleck & Graham I. Staines analyzes the effect of job schedules on the conflict between work & families, with particular attention to number of hours employed, days employed, & type of work shift, & finds that the impact on the time devoted to home & child care differs by gender, (5) Lawrence C. Marsh - Hours Worked by Husbands and Wives investigates the association between husbands' & wives' working hours outside the home, finding in most cases a positive r between numbers of hours worked by each, (6) Chaya S. Piotrkowski & Paul Crits-Christoph Women's Jobs and Family Adjustment examines the relationship between feelings of gratification & security on the job & in the family among women, finding a greater interpenetration of job characteristics with family relationships than with marital satisfaction, & (7) Bam Dev Sharda & Barry I. Nangle Marital Effects on Occupational Attainment discusses a longitudinal study of how marriage differentially affects occupational attainment in dual-earner couples, concluding that women's postmarital education gains are dependent on delaying childbirth & have far less of an effect on occupational attainment than with men, & that a negative relation exists between wives' occupational status at marriage & their husbands' subsequent occupational attainments. PART III - WITHIN THE TWO-EARNER FAMILY - deals with the domestic interaction of family members when both spouses are earners, & includes (8) Ida Harper Simpson & Paula England Conjugal Work Roles and Marital Solidarity - compares various theories concerning the effect of participation on marital solidarity, & argues that role similarity can strengthen the couple relation, (9) Margaret M. Poloma, Brian I. Pendleton, & I. Neal Garland - Reconsidering the Dual-Career Marriage: A Longitudinal Approach - discusses a longitudinal study of dual-career couples, showing that those family life-cycle stages when children are present are often periods of career stagnation for women, & depicting the strain on their dual commitment to family & professional roles, (10) Suzanne Model - Housework by Husbands: Determinants and Implications - analyzes data from a 1978 study to show that wives continue to perform the major share of household tasks when sharing earner roles with husbands, the only exceptions being when wives' earnings approach those of husbands, & (11) Bonnie E. Carlson Preschoolers Sex-Role Identity, Father-Role Perceptions, and Paternal Family Participation - reports on a study showing that preschool boys whose fathers share caregiving tasks have fewer stereotypical notions of family roles, but are no less masculine than boys from more traditional families. PART IV - A RESEARCH AGENDA - contains (12) Rhona Rapoport & Robert N. Rapoport - The Next Generation in Dual-Earner Family Research - presents a set of priorities for future research, emphasizing the impact of economic & technological changes, the macrosocial functioning of dual-earner families, effects on the personality of the child, the family life cycle, & the possibilities of support for such families & greater gender-role equity. 29 Tables, 1 Figure, 337 References

Cloth, $32.50

* A study of immigrant workers in postwar Western Europe, focused particularly on GB, France, Switzerland, & West Germany, & based on available data supplemented by interviews (N not specified), this book argues that the SE function of immigrant workers, rather than race, determines their social position, in 11 Chpts with a Preface & a Postscript (1) Introduction—outlines the study & presents six hypotheses immigration & the presence of immigrant workers are of long-term importance for contemporary European society, immigrant workers have a specific SE-function as the bottom stratum of the We, the division of the We within the production process is duplicated in the social sphere, this division has a subjective counterpart in prejudice among indigenous workers, the presence of a bottom stratum of immigrant workers permits social advancement for large segments of the indigenous We, & labor migration must be understood in the historical context of the international capitalist system, as a form of development aid given by poor countries to rich countries (2) Migration to Western Europe reviews the prewar history of migration into Western Europe, & discusses causes & development of postwar migration & geographic & demographic characteristics of immigrants (3) Position on the Labour Market—analyzes the employment situation of immigrants in the four main countries under study, & concludes that they all share disadvantages regarding concentration in unskilled occupations with low pay & bad working conditions & unemployment, & ascribes this inferior position to laws & practices of host societies (4) Trade Union Policies and Industrial Disputes examines factors contributing to the division between immigrant & indigenous workers in social relationships & class organization, including differences in employment sectors, language, culture, aims & legal position, the origins of racist stereotypes among indigenous workers, & trade unions' generally inadequate response to the implications of these problems for We solidarity (5) Education and Vocational Training for Adult Immigrants—discusses the status of immigrant workers with respect to language, literacy, & vocational skills, along with state & private efforts to address these needs, & problems with these efforts (6) The Education of Immigrant Children—considers the problems encountered by immigrant children at school, special provisions for language teaching & maintenance of original culture, the effects of efforts to disperse immigrant children among different schools, & prospects for higher education & employment. (7) Housing—examines the various kinds of low-quality housing provided for immigrants in the four countries, the existence of more or less permanent ghettos, & the relation between housing situation & LF stratum (8) Problems of Adaptation—discusses such problems as disease, criminality, & disruptions of family & social life, & considers the relative degrees to which these are caused by transplantation & by SE position. (9) The Political Economy of Migration analyzes the economic effects of immigration on indigenous workers & capitalists & on the countries of origin, & considers various theoretical approaches to the effects of immigration on inflation & the balance of payments (10) Prejudice, Race, and Class—examines hostility toward immigrants as manifested in attitude surveys, the anti-immigrant lobbies of different countries, & prejudice toward different immigrant groups, & considers the causes & function of prejudice (11) Immigrant Workers and Class Structure—proposes a modified Marxian theory of SC structure, argues that immigration has produced a restructuring of the We into indigenous & immigrant strata, a split which weakens it, & discusses the economic, social, & political effects of this development Postscript discusses changes in the situation of immigrant workers between 1973 & 1983 32 Tables, Bibliog of 295 items.

Cloth, $21.95.

1 A work in 8 Chpts & a Prologue addressing some of the controversial issues surrounding the academic performance of US high school students that were raised by the research conducted for High School Achievement: Public, Catholic, and Private High Schools Compared (Coleman, J S, Hoffer, T, & Kilgore, S, New York: Basic Books, 1982) This earlier research is extended, & some data limitations reduced, through comprehensive follow-up analyses of the 1980 High School & Beyond survey population, a sample of 20,000+ sophomores & seniors from 1,000+ high schools Achievement data were obtained in 1982, when the sophomores in the original survey were seniors & the original seniors had been out of school for 2 years, & again in 1984, when the groups were in the 11 & /or Coll or some other activity Results confirm the original conclusion that private schools, particularly Catholic ones, are more effective in promoting both immediate educational achievement & success in career/educational choices beyond high school, this effect is especially pronounced for disadvantaged & /or minority students Findings are discussed in terms of the different educational orientations held by public & private schools while the former view the school as an agent of the larger society or state, the latter see it as an agent of the individual family & /or (religious) community of which the family is part These orientations affect numerous aspects of school design that, in turn, attract different kinds of families & have differential impacts on their students, differences that are not attributable solely to family background variables. It is argued that the strong sense of community engendered by private schools, particularly Catholic ones, is of major importance in promoting children's & youth's subsequent achievement Changes in the role & functioning of the family in society will necessitate changes in the role & functioning of the school as a socialization agent within the larger community Implications for educational policy at the community, state, & federal levels, schooling design & administration, & parental decision making concerning their children's education are discussed. Schiller, Professor of Communications at the U of California, San Diego, in VI PARTS & 26 Chpts with the editors' Introduction to the book & each PART. PART I - THE FORMATIVE FUNCTIONS OF INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY - includes (1) Jan Ekecrantz The Social Construction of Technology Notes on Railroads and Computers draws a parallel between the technological innovations of railroads & computers to show the role of social context in the development of communications technology, (2) Cees J. Hamelink Is Information Technology Neutral? argues that information technology shares the inherent bias toward mechanistic knowledge of modern technology in general, & points to problems raised by the neglect of humanistic knowledge, (3) Robin Cheesman Can People Use Information Technology? posits radicalized trade unions & abandonment of full-time employment as essential to the democratic diffusion of information technology, (4) Neville Jayaweera The Third World and the Political Economy of the Communication Revolution discusses the introduction of information technology into the Third World & its effects, within a theoretical context of economic cycles, & (5) Eapen K. Eapen Transfer of Technology The INSAT Experience describes the social & political background & some consequences of a satellite TV system in India. PART II - INFORMATION, INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS, AND WARFARE - contains (6) Tapio Varis Patterns of Television Program Flow in International Relations examines the international exchange pattern of TV program materials, concluding that there has been no structural change in the last ten years in the global trend of a one-sided information flow, although there is increased differentiation & regional exchange, (7) Dallas W. Smythe On the Political Economy of CM argues that military & civilian aspects of society are no longer separate but form a single complex functioning through "command, control, communication, information" (CM), & criticizes Marxist & other theories for failing to see military demand as the driving force for the growth of monopoly capitalism, & (8) Vincent Mosco New Technology and Space Warfare considers some of the political & economic effects of the militarization of technology through such projects as the Strategic Defense Initiative. PART III - MODES OF CULTURAL DOMINATION AND RESISTANCE - includes (9) Stuart Ewen Youth Culture analyzes the youth culture of the 1960s & its transformation into a culture of youth in the 1980s, "an icon of commercial sensuality"; (10) Dieter Prokop Towards a Psychoanalytical Critique of Mass Communication investigates the existence of progressive productive forces in mass culture & their connection, either developmental or constrictive, to the existing modes of production, & discusses contradiction & conflicts present in the products of internationalized media, (11) Muolshéachlainn Ó Caollai Cultural Domination in Europe. The Case of Ireland gives a historical account of the cultural & economic means by which England has subjugated the Irish, particularly language, education, & market integration, (12) Ngũgĩ wa Thiong'o Kenyan Culture: The National Struggle for Survival-details the various aspects of foreign domination of Kenyan culture, focusing on the theater; & (13) Tran Van Dinh & Rosemary Porter Is the Concept of National Sovereignty Outdated? addresses the issue of national sovereignty for smaller & less powerful nations, & explores the dialectical need of capitalism to both break down & create national barriers. PART IV - THE NEW INFORMATION ORDER. STRUGGLES AND RECONSIDERATIONS - contains (14) Wolfgang Kleinwächter Freedom or Responsibility versus Freedom and Responsibility-reviews the history of international communications agreements from 1865 & argues that, while in the 1950s & 1960s, international information issues were treated primarily as human rights questions, in the 1970s & 1980s, they have come to be treated as relations between nations; (15) Enrique Gonzalez Manet-Will UNESCO Be Crippled?-argues that US opposition to UNESCO on issues of communications is based on transnational business

& political interests, & concludes that UNESCO continues to receive solid support from Third World countries; (16) Yassen N. Zassoursky-The Future of the Debate on the New International Information Order and the Intergovernmental Programme for the Development of Communication-describes UNESCO's Intergovernmental Program for the Development of Communication & analyzes the US opposition to it, pointing out the political, economic, & ideological motivations behind that opposition; (17) William H. Melody & Rohan Samarajiva-Canada's Contradictions on the New International Information Order-examines the Canadian government's ambivalence on both domestic & international levels toward the principles of the New International Information Order (NIIO), (18) Rafael Roncagliolo-New Information Order in Latin America A Taxonomy for National Communication Policies-provides & illustrates a taxonomy for classifying Latin American experiences with national communication policies, & suggests some necessary components of a democratic policy, & (19) Kaarle Nordenstreng-Tanzania and the New Information Order A Case Study of Africa's Second Struggle-examines the discrepancy between the stated intention of creating a new, decolonized & democratic information order in Tanzania & the relative failure of this policy in practice. PART V - RECONSTRUCTING INFORMATION PATTERNS AND PRACTICES - includes (20) Breda Pavlič-Non-Alignment and Communication: Looking Ahead-assesses the efforts of the Non-Aligned Movement to promote the NIIO & considers some tasks for furthering this objective; (21) Raquel Salinas Bascor-Latin American Communication Policies: New Battles around the Old Issues-reviews recent trends in communication policy in Latin America, particularly regarding popular participation, & notes that advances in regional coordination have outpaced domestic progress; (22) Ian Reinecke Information Technology in Australia. The Trade Union Response recounts the efforts of Australian communications trade unions to exert control over the introduction of new communication technology; & (23) Olga Linné-Why Do Female Media Professionals Produce Male Messages?-discusses ways in which employment patterns & gender representation in the mass media reflect M dominance. PART VI - MEETING THE FUTURE: RESEARCH AND ACTION - contains (24) George Gerbner-The Challenge before Us-considers the role played by the communications discipline in the development of access to & participation in institutional decision making, with special emphasis on the critical study of TV, (25) James D. Halloran-International Democratization of Communication The Challenge for Research-proposes principles, criteria, & research programs for communications research that will enable it to take part in the democratization of communication, & (26) Stuart Ewen-BILLBOARDS of the FUTURE A Brief History-gives a first person account of the genesis & continuation of the alternative media project, "Billboards of the Future". ¶ This wide-ranging critique of theories of social change, translated by J. C. Whitehouse from La Place du désordre (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1984), proposes a theory emphasizing disorder in social life & the divergence of social patterns from intended outcomes, with 7 Chpts, a Foreword, & an Epilogue. (1) Theories of Social Change-describes four basic types of theory of social change-based on the search for trends, conditional or structural laws, the forms of change, or the causes of change-& outlines a criticism of each. (2) Individual Action, Aggregation Effects and Social Change-examines the strengths & weaknesses inherent in using individual action to explain social change, with particular emphasis on the problems of determining motivation, the scientific status of psychology, notions of individualism & rationality, & the perception of aggregation effects. (3) The Laws Governing Change-The Nomological Bias-takes issue with Karl Popper's claim that the aim of a theory of social change is the discovery of laws, arguing that social systems are too complex to be subsumed under laws, particularly conditional laws, & illustrates the distinction between laws & models. (4) Structures and Change: The Structuralist Bias-considers two notions of structure, as "type" & as "essential characteristics," & the problems raised by the concepts of "structural change" & the "structural causes" of change. (5) The Search for the Prime Mover: The Ontological

9 A vol in the series Studies in Social Thought: Polity and Civil Society (Arthur J. Vidich & Stanford M. Lyman, series editors), this book is a meditation on Max Weber in the context of two crises—in the social sciences, caused by the divorce between method & substance; & in industrial societies, caused by development on the basis of reductive rationality undermining social cohesion—in 5 Chpts with author's Preface. (1) The Method, or Concepts Plus Techniques—discusses the treatment of Weber as a classic, his commitment, the importance of historical culture in sociology, his synthesis & transcendence of historicism & positivism, individualism, & the relationship of science & values. (2) Ethical Norms and Economic Behavior—deals with prevalent misunderstandings about Weber's The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (Parsons, Talcott [Tr], London: Allen & Unwin, 1930 [1904], see SA 71/595444), particularly regarding the conceptual framework, the meaning of "ethics," capitalism, calling, & the necessity of rationalization. (3) The Problem of Power—considers authority, obedience, elitism, bureaucratic power, charismatic leadership, German political history, & political parties. (4) The Sociology of Universal Religions—goes further into Weber's analysis of capitalism, the reciprocal determination of social, cultural, & economic factors, the methodological problem of comprehending this relationship, some affinities between Weber & Karl Marx, & some of Weber's critics. (5) The Modern World and Its Destiny. From "Disenchantment" to "Steel Cage"—discusses Weber's analysis of the process of rationalization in industrial society, including such concepts as disenchantment, routinization, specialization, charisma, & the individual, & considers the relationship of his theory to subsequent history. Bibliog of 53 of Weber's works.

9 A vol in 6 Chpts (4 of which are revised from Harry Camp Memorial Lectures delivered at Stanford U in spring 1983, & 1 originally published in Raritan, 1983, fall) with an author's Preface, which explores how anthropologists write, primarily through detailed case studies of the text-building strategies employed in landmark works by four quite different sociocultural, ethnographically oriented anthropologists: Claude Lévi-Strauss, Edward Evan Evans-Pritchard, Bronislaw Malinowski, & Ruth Benedict. (1) Being There: Anthropology and the Scene of Writing explores reasons underlying previous resistance toward examining the peculiarities & mechanics of anthropological writing. Anthropology is shown to resemble "literary" discourses more than "scientific" ones. (2) The World in a Text: How to Read 'Tristes Tropiques' reviews two common descriptions of the organization of Lévi-Strauss's work—linear & quantum—and rejects them in favor of a "centrifugal" approach, showing how his works are characterized by different sorts of texts being superimposed on each other to bring out an overall kaleidoscopic pattern. Focus is on Tristes Tropiques ([The Sad Tropics], Paris, 1955) as a travelogue, ethnography, philosophical text, reformist tract, symbolist literary work, & ultimately, a quest story involving the anthropologist-as-seeker myth. (3) Slide Show: Evans-Pritchard's African Transparencies—uses excerpts from Edward Evan Evans-Pritchard's little-noticed "Operations on the Akobo and Gila Rivers, 1940-41" (The Army Quarterly, 1973, 103, 4, July, 1-10) to illustrate his characteristic "of course" style, through which what appear to be bizarre aspects of other cultures are disentranced by describing them in the (seemingly) offhand tone used to describe one's own culture. (4) I-Witnessing: Malinowski's Children—examines how Bronislaw Malinowski's A Diary in the Strict Sense of the Term (New York, 1967) epitomizes his "join-the-brutes," total-immersion style of ethnography. Two antithetical images of the anthropologist are revealed: the "absolute cosmopolite," who is adaptive & subjective, & the "complete investigator," who is dispassionate & objective; their simultaneous existence is explored using excerpts from four other works. Malinowski's "I-witness" style is compared to the styles used by other anthropologists, including Kenneth Read, Paul Rabinow, Vincent Crapanzano, & Kevin Dwyer. (5) Us/Not-Us: Benedict's Travels—illustrates Ruth Benedict's edificatory ethnography & its characteristic irony & powerful expository style through an examination of two of her major works: Patterns of Culture (New York, 1959 [1932]), & The Chrysanthemum and the Sword: Patterns of Japanese Culture (New York, 1974 [1946]). It is shown how she perfected a genre that has often been ruined by moral posturing, exaggerated self-consciousness, & ideological preconceptions through an "Us/Not-Us" style used so successfully by satirists like Jonathan Swift. (6) Being Here Whose Life Is It Anyway?—examines the incongruities inherent in the fact that anthropologists no matter how foreign their subject matter—must ultimately write for the world of academe. The social relationships between anthropologists & the cultures they explore have been radically altered by the end of colonialism, imperialism, & scientism, resultant moral & epistemological issues are discussed. It is argued, however, that this current disarray need not mean the "end of what has been anthropology"; new roles for anthropologists & an enlargement of the possibilities of their discourse are examined. The benefits & hazards of regarding the anthropological vocation as a literary one are summarized.

9 Oriented in part to Max Weber's analysis of bureaucracy, this collection of essays, No. 65 in the Contributions to Sociology series (Don Martindale, series editor), attempts to assess the current state of bureaucratic administration in both capitalism & socialism, & to consider solutions to the problems posed by bureaucracy, in III PARTS & 14 Chpts with Epilogue & editors' Introduction. PART I - THE PROBLEM—includes (1) Wolfgang Schluchter: From Government over Persons to the Administration of Things. Marx and Engels on Bureaucracy examines texts of Karl Marx, Friedrich Engels, & V. I. Lenin to demonstrate their concern with the elimination of bureaucracy in favor of a primitive democracy embodying the principles of self-government. (2) Ernest Kiler: Max Weber and the Possibilities for Socialism see SA 33/5/85Q1131. (3) Wolfgang J. Mommsen: Max Weber and the Crisis of Liberal Democracy argues that for Weber the adaptation of liberal principles to the conditions of industrial society required a critical understanding of the restraints placed by bureaucracy on the free initiative of the individual personality, & (4) Ronald M. Glassman: Conflicts between Legal and Bureaucratic Systems of Authority discusses the evolution of systems of authority based on rational efficiency, on the one hand, & adherence to law, on the other, delineates the areas in which they frequently conflict, & poses the question of whether bureaucratic authority must eventually undermine legal authority. PART II - AUTHORITARIAN TENDENCIES—contains (5) Kathi Vallone Friedman: Social Rights in the Welfare State. The Contrast between Adjudication and Administration in the United States develops a distinction between social rights & gratuitous benefits, describes the growing power of the welfare state in administering benefits, & argues that the weaker legitimization of the welfare state will make necessary the creation of a welfare society based on social rights & the free exchange of talents; (6) Paul L. Rosen: The Patient at Peril: Hospital Bureaucracy and Medical Records; (7) Robert Jackall: The Moral Ethos of Bureaucracy see SA 33/5/85Q1532; (8) Kenneth O'Reilly: Bureaucracy and Civil Liberties. Cloth,$49.50. Paper,$19.95

¶ This vol, part of the SUNY (State U of New York) Series in Near Eastern Studies (series editor, Said Amir Arjomand), is a collection of papers presented at a conference on the origins & diversity of axial age civilizations (held Jan 1983 in Bad Homburg, West Germany), organized in V PARTS & 21 Chpts, with a Preface & an Introduction to the book & to each PART by the editor. Five main issues are emphasized: the structural-historical conditions of these civilizations' emergence; the diversity of axial age civilizations; the impact of a basic concept of tension between mundane & transcendental orders on thought & symbolism; the institutional repercussions of this impact; & the secondary breakthroughs within the framework of the first axial age civilizations. PART I - THE ORIGINS OF THE AXIAL AGE IN ANCIENT GREECE - contains (1) Yehuda Elkana-The Emergence of Second-Order Thinking in Classical Greece-suggests that Greece experienced not just one but a series of breakthroughs, & traces these in Greek thought; (2) Christian Meier-The Emergence of an Autonomous Intelligence among the Greeks explores the preconditions for the emergence of autonomous intellect in ancient Greece, seeing the emergence of democracy as especially relevant; (3) S. C. Humphreys-Dynamics of the Greek Breakthrough: The Dialogue between Philosophy and Religion-describes the emergence of a secular & skeptical model of the cosmos in ancient Greece that was based on empiricism, the primacy of public life, & logic;

Age: An Interpretation of Plato's Cratylus 400c-examines the spiritual beliefs of the axial age through a reading of Plato's Cratylus. PART II - THE ORIGINS OF THE AXIAL AGE IN ANCIENT ISRAEL-WITH A COMPARATIVE LOOK AT ASSYRIA - includes (5) Benjamin Uffenheimer-Myth and Reality in Ancient Israel-argues that biblical monotheistic myth was central to Israel & to Christianity, traces its differences from ancient Near Eastern pagan myth, & demonstrates its impact on politics & society in ancient Israel; (6) Moshe Weinfield-The Protest against Imperialism in Ancient Israelite Prophecy-argues that protests against imperialism in the ancient world often took the form of prophecies, eg, Israelite prophetic literature being a protest against Assyrian domination; (7) Peter Machinist-On Self-Consciousness in Mesopotamia-attempts to test the axial thesis through a case study of ancient Mesopotamia, a preaxial civilization, & also attempts to determine where self-consciousness first began to emerge, & (8) Hayim Tadmor-Monarchy and the Elite in Assyria and Babylonia The Question of Royal Accountability-suggests that some postaxial elements had begun to appear in ancient Mesopotamia, despite the generally preaxial character of its civilizations-the accountability of the king to a "higher order" & to elite groups being one such element. PART III - THE SECONDARY BREAKTHROUGHS IN LATE ANTIQUITY-SECOND TEMPLE JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY - contains (9) Michael E. Stone-Eschatology, Remythologization and Cosmic Aporia-examines three transformations in Second Temple Judaism: from oral tradition to sacred scripture, from history to metahistory, & from historical to cosmic redemption; (10) Gedaliahu G. Stroumsa Old Wine and New Bottles On Patristic Soteriology and Rabbinic Judaism examines Christianity's self-definition & its contrasts to both Judaism & paganism; (11) Hans G. Kippenberg-The Role of Christianity in the Depolitization of the Roman Empire-suggests that the transformation of Christianity from a prophetic apocalyptic movement to an institutionalized church must be understood in relation to the disintegration of ancient city life, eg, the bishop's authority was not the result of a secularization of charisma but grew out of the need to create & govern institutions that protected believers against social chaos, & (12) G. W. Bowersock-Architects of Competing Transcendental Visions in Late Antiquity-explores the competing roles of philosophers, theologians, & MDs as intellectual elites of the second century AD, & the competition of Gnosticism, Manichaeism, & neo-Platonism with Christianity. PART IV - THE ORIGINS OF THE AXIAL AGE IN CHINA AND INDIA - includes (13) Cho-Yun Hsu-Historical Conditions of the Emergence and Crystallization of the Confucian System-argues that a stage even earlier than Confucianism in Chinese axial civilization was the appearance of a moral god in the Shang Dynasty (1765-1122 BC), & explores the emergence of Confucianism & its crystallization in the Han period; (14) Mark Elvin Was There a Transcendental Breakthrough in China?-suggests that ancient China never developed the basic opposition between categories that characterized other civilizations, being inherently ecological in orientation & seeing all of reality as a unified whole; (15) Tu Wei-Ming-The Structure and Function of the Confucian Intellectual in Ancient China-opines that though Confucian intellectuals did not influence those in power, they did shape society in general through their emphasis on education; (16) Hermann Kulke-The Historical Background of India's Axial Age-traces the historical background of the axial age in India & examines the evidence for various sources: the Indus civilization, the Achaemenid foreign influence, or indigenous developments; (17) J. C. Heesterman-Ritual, Revelation, and Axial Age-argues that Vedic ritual reflects the axial breakthrough in India as fully as does Buddhism; (18) David Shulman-Aśvatthāman and Bhānūnāḍa Brahmin and Kingly Paradigms in the Sanskrit Epic-offers a reading of the Mahābhārata in which two of its characters, an "inverted" king & an outcaste Brahmin, appear not merely as distortions of their roles but as hidden aspects of them that reflect an axial transformation in their content; (19) Edward Shils-Some Observations on the Place of Intellectuals in Max Weber's Sociology, with Special Reference to Hinduism-explores the role of Brahmins as priest/magician intellectuals; (20) Stanley J. Tambiah-The Reflexive and Institutional Achievements of Early Buddhism-discusses the social organization of Buddhist monks as an intellectual community. PART V - ISLAM - consists of (21) Michael Cook-The Emergence of Islamic Civilisation-remarks on the extraordinarily rapid rise of Islam & on its character as the religion of barbarians who conquered civilized peoples

Associated with High Research Productivity—investigates the extent to which 29 personality factors can account for individual differences in research productivity & teaching performance, using data from 121 psychology faculty at 9 Canadian Un., which indicate that the constellation of personality traits characterizing the creative researcher & effective teacher are approximately orthogonal; (6) Douglas N. Jackson—Scientific and Technological Innovation: Its Personal and Motivational Context—reviews research on personal & environmental conditions that encourage productivity among scientists & technical personnel, & argues that the qualities of scientists' value systems, achievement motivation, & sources of work satisfaction are different from those of other workers, & must be acknowledged in planning organizational climates so as to maximize creativity & productivity; (7) Norman S. Endler—The Scholarly Impact of Psychologists—analyzes the research scholarship of the 25 most-cited academic psychologists in Canada over time (1972-1983), & develops & tests a new weighted productivity index, & (8) Pierre L. van den Bergh—Evolution and Creativity: Some Playful Musings—compares evidence for the maximalist & minimalist views of gene-culture interaction, with focus on the evolution of human creativity & self-consciousness, & suggests that creativity evolved as an antidote to boredom & has its origins in play behavior. PART III - SOCIOCULTURAL ORIGINS - includes (9) Daniel Perlman & Elizabeth Dean—The Wisdom of Solomon: Avoiding Bias in the Publication Review Process—examines evaluation bias in academia with focus on the journal review process, & offers some suggestions for improvement; (10) Henry L. Roediger, III—The Role of Journal Editors in the Scientific Process—traces the history of scientific periodicals & some changing views of editors, constructs a model of the editorial process & peer review system to illustrate the stages at which editors can be most influential, & presents evidence from a survey of editors from 19 psychology journals showing that bias toward their own research areas is a myth; (11) Lee B. Sechrest—Approaches to Ensuring Quality of Data and Performance: Lessons for Science?—identifies three problem areas affecting the quality of scientific findings—quality of numbers, conclusions, & interpretations—& describes various types of dishonesty & errors, as well as some quality assurance ("enhancement") mechanisms & the reasons that they fail; (12) John J. Furedy—Melding Capitalist versus Socialist Models of Fostering Scientific Excellence—notes the disadvantages of both extreme capitalist (US) & extreme socialist (USSR) scientific research environments, compares these systems with those in Canada, Australia, GB, & Hungary, & offers some suggestions for reform of the situation in the US; (13) Janet Beavin Bavelas—Permitting Creativity in Science—describes some techniques for generating original ideas in science & nurturing them to fruition, & presents a detailed case study as an example; (14) Harry G. Murray—Development of Scientific Productivity: Impact of Graduate Teaching and Thesis Supervision—provides a simple causal model of various student, teacher, & departmental characteristics that can affect the subsequent scientific productivity of graduate students, based on a review of data from 6 empirical studies; (15) Esther R. Greenglass—The Psychology of Women and Scientific Research—evaluates the processes involved in the generation & systematization of psychological knowledge on women, presenting evidence of a lack of sensitivity toward gender issues that has produced a sexist bias in both the theory & methodology of empirical research, & (16) Jonathan R. Cole—Women in Science—examines the history of women in science & their position in the scientific community today, noting that although formal status inequalities have been substantially reduced, full participation by Fs in the informal activities & social networks of the community has not been achieved. 19 Tables, 22 Figures, 1 Appendix, 661 References.

Cloth, $24.95.

1 This book combines a theoretical discussion of the sociological measurement of stress, a state-by-state study of stress levels in the US, & an analysis of regional differences in correlations between stress, illness, & criminal behavior, in III PARTS & 6 Chpts, with a Foreword by Sol Levine. PART I - STRESS AND SOCIETY - includes (1) A Sociological Perspective on Stress—argues for a social, as opposed to strictly individual, understanding of the causes & consequences of stress, examines & attempts to synthesize the sociological & life events approaches to stress, & discusses the theoretical & practical importance of social stress research; (2) Measurement of Social System Stress—develops & defends the composite State Stress Index, drawing on established indicators of stressful life events, & (3) Life Stresses in American States and Regions ranks each of the fifty states for overall stress & by each stress indicator, & notes regional patterns of overall stress & specific stressors. PART II - THE CORRELATES OF STRESS - includes (4) Stress, Crime, and Violence—considers the theoretical rationale for a r between stress & crime, examines state differences & regional patterns of crime, & shows & discusses the r between stress & crime (stronger for violent, weaker for property crime); & (5) Stress, Maladaptive Behavior, and Disease examines geographic distribution of maladaptive (self-destructive) behavior, analyzes the r between stress & maladaptive behavior, considers relations between stress & death rates for disease & disorders of the immune system, & concludes that while maladaptive behavior generally correlates with stress, only the death rates for perforated ulcers, asthma, & respiratory disease correlate with stress, & that nearly all these correlations are stronger among women than among men. PART III - CONTEXT AND CONCLUSIONS - contains (6) Theories, Levels, and Applications—studies the relationship between stress at the social & individual levels, considers the points of agreement & disagreement between social disorganization & life events theories, discusses the effects of societal reaction & cultural factors on the directions of stress outcomes, & suggests possible practical social implications of this research. 23 Tables, 4 Figures, 166 References.

1 A phenomenological investigation into the limiting framework imposed on everyday perception at various stages in life by social powers, this book is also an attempt to clarify the fragmented struggle for reversal of the exclusivity of this atomizing structure, which cuts humans off from the primordial mutuality joining them; a vol in the International Library of Sociology series (John Rex, series editor), in II PARTS & 10 Chpts with author's Preface & a Foreword by Kurt H. Wolff. Introduction: Themes in Sociology That Point towards Our Motive—reviews prior work in sociology, psychoanalysis, & philosophy concerned with issues of identity, experience, knowledge, & rationality. PART I - EXCAVATING PHENOMENOLOGY: A CRITICAL VIEW - critically examines the phenomenological tradition in an effort to reveal, by means of phenomenological reduction, the patterns underlying our basic perceptual structure, in (1) Husserl: A Search for Meaning and Method; (2) Heidegger: The Shroud of the Average on Our Being-in-the-World; (3) Merleau-Ponty: An Archaeology of Perception; & (4) Schutz: The Reinstatement of the "Natural Attitude". PART II - A TRANSITION TO AN ALTERNATIVE - departs from theoretical discourse in an effort to journey to a different mode of consciousness from the imposed atomization of the everyday, seeking to speak from this different experience rather than about it, in (5) Entering the Process: Addicts of an Imposed State of Consciousness—discusses the obstacles placed by ordinary rationality to the way of an alternative experience & suggests how the required disk

& clients & the problems they can cause, & discusses the impact of computers on statistical consulting. (2) Tony Greenfield—Consultants' Cameos. A Chapter of Encounters—uses a series of anecdotes to illustrate various problems, particularly in client-consultant relations, & gives a list of general suggestions for beginning consultants. (3) V. Barnett—Straight Consulting presents three case studies, one from archaeology & two from medicine, to illustrate how real problems motivate methodological research. (4) D. Clayton & M. Hills—A Two-Period Crossover Trial discusses the merits & problems of crossover designs in medical applications of statistics & demonstrates the adaptation of theoretical ideals to practical necessities in such a design involving pharmaceutical research. (5) D. G. Cook & S. J. Pocock—Consultancy in a Medical School, Illustrated by a Clinical Trial for Treatment of Primary Biliary Cirrhosis illustrates the development of long-term scientific collaboration between statisticians & MDs by means of one clinical study. (6) G. Dunn—The Analysis of Response Latencies—presents an example of the statistical handling of repeated measurements in a psychophysiological experiment, emphasizing the virtues of simplicity vs technical sophistication. (7) J. N. R. Jeffers—Acid Rain and Tree Roots: An Analysis of an Experiment demonstrates the importance of the statistician's participation in the design & conduct of an experiment by discussing a case where this did not happen, indicates what analytical measures can be taken in such cases, & suggests guidelines to those designing experiments. (8) J. C. Gower & R. W. Payne—On Identifying Yeasts and Related Problems—deals with the problem of constructing classifications, showing how collaboration between taxonomists & statisticians can lead to the development of computer software & the resolution of methodological problems. (9) Toby Lewis—Uneven Sex Ratios in the Light-Brown Apple Moth: A Problem in Outlier Allocation—uses an unusual outlier problem to show that the consultant should beware of being dogmatic in presenting results to clients. (10) B. J. T. Morgan, P. M. North, & S. E. Pack—Collaboration between University and Industry—gives examples of several ways in which statisticians in a U can act as consultants for industry, pointing out the special requirements of industrial statistical consultancy & the benefits of having a consultancy unit attached to a U department of statistics. (11) P. M. F. Altham—Inspection for Faulty Components before or after Assembly of Manufactured Items—describes a computer program designed to help the manufacturer decide which components of a product should be inspected before assembly, discusses the optimization & statistical inference aspects of the problem, & demonstrates the importance of simulations in communicating with a client. (12) M. Atkin & R. Healey—Statistical Modelling of the EEC Labour Force Survey: A Project History—describes the contracting, management, & use of the data of three studies on unemployment rates conducted for the Statistical Office of the European Economic Community. 44 Tables, 23 Figures, Bibliog of 68 items, 195 References.

¶ A review of research on the use of concepts from drama for understanding social interaction, assuming a continuum ranging from nondramatic everyday activities through consciously staged social events to theater productions, in III PARTS & 13 Chpts with authors' Preface. PART I - DRAMA, SELF, AND AUDIENCE - includes (1) The Dramaturgical Perspective—describes performance phases & basic concepts of dramaturgical analysis; (2) Types and Divisions of Dramas—discusses the four basic types of drama (tragedy, comedy, melodrama, & farce) as they appear in the literature on theater, analyzes the thirty-six basic dramatic situations proposed by G. Polt & classifies them into seven sets, & discusses the temporal development of a drama; (3) Presentation of Self—summarizes research on the ways in which the individual presents the "self" to others, & discusses situations in which individuals adopt several roles or induce others to play certain roles. (4) Erving Goffman—Teams—contains excerpts from The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1959); & (5) Audience—discusses the function of an audience in social interaction, considers the importance of its presence or absence, & classifies social activities according to their relationship to an audience & whether the activity is real or primarily symbolic. PART II - THE DRAMATIC PRODUCTION - contains (6) The Actable Idea—describes & gives examples of four categories of actable ideas (image, theme, plot, & script)

tween setting & behavior, giving examples from political settings & public drinking spaces; (8) Actors and Roles—describes each of the basic dramatic roles that may be played during a performance, from playwright to protagonist, & considers the relationship between self & role & the ways of moving in & out of roles; & (9) New Meanings—examines the ways in which dramatic events can end with new meanings for both actors & audience, with either the group providing a new meaning for the individual or vice versa. PART III - VARIETIES OF ENACTMENT - includes (10) David A. Snow, Louis A. Zurcher, & Robert Peters—Football Victory Celebrations in America—an excerpt from "Victory Celebrations as Theater: A Dramaturgical Approach to Crowd Behavior" (see SA 30:3/82M3312); (11) A. Paul Hare—Protest Demonstration in South Africa—gives a dramaturgical analysis of the 1960 massacre at Sharpeville; (12) R. S. ¶ A collection of essays by psychologists, sociologists, & information scientists who (with one exception) participated in a conference of the same title at the U of Western Ontario, London, in Apr 1985, in III PARTS & 16 Chpts with a Foreword by Harriet Zuckerman & a Preface by the editors. It offers largely empirical investigations into the origins & nature of scientific creativity, conditions that foster scientific discovery & productivity, the evaluation of scientific excellence, & biological, environmental influences on superior scientific ability & performance from early life through maturity. PART I - ASSESSMENT - consists of (1) Eugene Garfield—Mapping the World of Science: Is Citation Analysis a Legitimate Evaluation Tool?—evaluates the use of citation analysis to measure scientific productivity, demonstrates the co-citation (cluster) analysis technique used by the Instit for Scientific Information, & suggests that, through producing graphic representations ("maps") of scientific fields & their active research concentrations, a more quantitative form of journal evaluation is possible. PART II - PERSONOLOGICAL ORIGINS - contains (2) Philip E. Vernon—Historical Overview of Research on Scientific Abilities—explores twenty-five areas of current psychological knowledge concerning scientific talent & creativity in various fields; (3) Robert S. Albert & Mark A. Runco—The Possible Different Personality Dispositions of Scientists and Nonscientists—reports partial results of a longitudinal study begun in 1969 on the attainment of eminence, focusing on personality traits that characterize Ms eminent in science & nonscience & the persistence of such traits over time, & arguing that dispositional differences between scientists & nonscientists are temperamentally based rather than experientially acquired; (4) Dean Keith Simonton—Multiples, Chance, Genius, Creativity, and Zeitgeist—examines the controversy surrounding the existence of multiples—scientific discoveries that are independently & often simultaneously achieved by separate investigators—& reviews explanations offered by communication & chance theories; (5) J. Philippe Rushton.

the various stages of de-alienation. (6) Albert Cherns—Reflections on the Relationships between New Technology and Social Systems—discusses the positive effects of new technology on the quality of working life & its potential for reducing alienation, as well as more pessimistic views of the effects of new technology on working life. (7) Menachem Rosner—Sociological Aspects of Alienation and Anomie. Theoretical Concepts and Empirical Research—attempts to integrate Marxist concepts & analysis with non-Marxist sociological theory in creating a conceptual framework for the theoretical analysis of alienation & its empirical study, using the Israeli kibbutz as an illustration of the social determinants of alienation & de-alienation. (8) S. Giora Shoham—Rebellion and Yearning—draws on the literature of Albert Camus & the concept of authenticity to indicate an existentialist approach to alienation & anomie, with defiance & rebellion providing the keys to de-alienation. 3 Figures, Bibliog of 351 items.

Cloth, $29.95

1 A vol in the Rose Monograph Series of the American Sociological Assoc (series editor, Ernest Q. Campbell), this book takes issue with modern psychology's preoccupation with the role of ego defenses in neurosis, arguing that defenses are a routine & effective part of ordinary social behavior & are determined by nature of the social relations they are intended to preserve, in 6 Chpts with 6 Appendixes & author's Foreword. (1) To Anticipate What Follows - describes the longitudinal studies of families & adolescents (N = 118 families) that serve as a basis for the book's argument (the Oakland Growth Study & the Berkeley Guidance Study, initiated around 1930 by the Inst of Human Development at the U of California, Berkeley, & continuing through 1981). (2) Ego Defenses in Everyday Life - draws critically from Sigmund Freud's account of defenses to specify features of ego defenses that distinguish them from other self-justifications, introduces claims that defenses are socially, not biologically, generated as a process of social interdependence, & reviews attempts to systematize variations in defenses. (3) Defenses and Sources of Danger - describes types of threat, the kinds of social relations likely to provide them, & the defenses likely to be associated with them, & provides indicators for social relations used in the study. (4) Social Foundations of Complexity in Defense - classifies defenses by degree of cognitive complexity & develops a theory explaining defense choice by linking types of threat, complexity of defense, & complexity of social relations in which they arise. (5) Interpretations of Ten Defenses. Theory and Evidence - explains the analysis of data in the study under consideration; & presents the relations between the variance of each of ten defenses & the pattern of social relations associated with it. (6) Extensions, Explorations, and Conclusions - summarizes findings & discusses the preliminary implications of the foregoing data analysis for the proposed theory. Appendix 1: Supplementary Tables. Appendix 2: Development of Scores on Disciplinary Practices. Appendix 3: Social Foundations of Personal Development. Appendix 4: Interpretations of Four More Defenses. Appendix 5: Another Categorization of Defenses. Appendix 6: Further Analysis of Two Sets of Factors. 10 Tables, 28 Figures, Bibliog of 243 items.

1 A joint publication in the Jossey-Bass Management Series & the Jossey-Bass Social & Behavioral Science Series (Warren Bennis, Richard O. Mason, & Ian I. Mitroff, series editors), this collection of essays by members of the U of California, Los Angeles, Group covers a wide range of recent research on organizational behavior (OB) & organizational development (OD), investigating the individual, small group, large system, & environmental aspects of organizational theory & practice, in IV PARTS with 22 Chpts, Epilogue, & editors' Preface. (1) Fred Massarik, Newton Margulies, & Robert Tannenbaum: The Development of Human Systems: Basic Themes explores the basic organizational research themes of (A) the human matrix, (B) values, (C) change, (D) behavioral science & the pursuit of research, (E) holistic & systems perspectives, & (F) human experience, personal meaning, & alternate realities, suggests that the term "human systems development" be used to designate an enlarged field integrating the concepts & empirical work of OB & OD, & outlines issues central to the field's present concerns & future developments. PART I - THE PERSON AND HUMAN EXPERIENCE - includes (2) Fred Massarik: Human Experience, Phenomenology, and the Process of Deep Sharing - explores the process of the deep sharing of personal meanings with others & the resultant enhancement of basic humanness, & describes the phenomenological interview as a device for drawing inferences about the experience of others; (3) Robert W. Hanna: Personal Meaning: Its Loss and Rediscovery - considers personal meaning from the viewpoint of breakup, dissolution, & rediscovery, & suggests that understanding both individual & organizational meaning is important in establishing new organizational directions; & (4) Meryl Reis Louis: Career Transition and Adaptation: Appreciating and Facilitating the Experience - examines steps an individual can take to manage transition in an organization. PART II - ORGANIZATIONS: PROCESSES OF DESIGNING AND CHANGING - contains (5) Robert Tannenbaum & Robert W. Hanna: Holding On, Letting Go, and Moving On: Understanding a Neglected Perspective on Change - considers how difficulties in individual change produce obstacles in bringing about organizational change, & discusses processes of letting go & moving on; (6) Samuel A. Culbert & John J. McDonough: How Reality Gets Constructed in an Organization - looks at the construction & modification of the dominant reality in an organizational setting & the need to balance stability with individuals' desire to modify that reality; (7) Louis E. Davis: Guides to the Design and Redesign of Organizations - discusses cation from ordinary spatiality & temporality might be achieved; (6) Transition to an Alternate Way of Seeing—describes a method of seeing, based in part on daydreaming, which opens both self & world to alteration & fusion; (7) The Fear Barrier and the Tautology Barrier: Mutuality Severed in the Maintenance of the Atomized "Individual"—examines the fear that arises when one encounters the alternate reality, particularly fear of fusion & loss of identity, & the limitations on experience it imposes; (8) Deeper into an Alternate Consciousness: Means of Blockage, Means of Liberation—describes & illustrates the process of using "memory glows," recollections of crucial points in life, when alternate capacities are severed & dammed up; (9) Beyond the Time Barrier: The Sanity Barrier—considers various aspects of an alternative consciousness, especially implications for intersubjectivity; & (10) Transition to an Alternate Spatiality: "Seeing" and "Meaning" Merge and Become Fused in Concentration—examines the limitations imposed on visual perception, alternatives to it, & implications for intersubjectivity. 27 Figures, 116 References.

1 A collection of essays dealing with various aspects of Herbert Marcuse's critical theory, in VI PARTS & 12 Chpts, Introduced by the editors. PART I - NEGATION AND AFFIRMATION - includes (1) Jürgen Habermas—Psychic Thermidor and the Rebirth of Rebellious Subjectivity—discusses the positive instinctual basis for negativity in Marcuse's theory; (2) Richard J. Bernstein—Negativity: Theme and Variations—examines the Hegelian origins of Marcuse's dialectical thinking, & criticizes him for insufficiently considering the concrete nature of social & political life; & (3) Martin Jay—Reflections on Marcuse's Theory of Remembrance—reconstructs a theory of remembrance from Marcuse's writings & argues for its importance in providing a critical impulse (originally published in Theory & Society; see SA 31:1/83M7271). PART II - PHILOSOPHICAL ORIGINS - contains (4) Alfred Schmidt (Tr by Anne-Marie Feenberg & Andrew Feenberg)—Existential Ontology and Historical Materialism in the Work of Herbert Marcuse—traces Marcuse's encounter with Martin Heidegger & the latter's influence on him, especially regarding his theory of history, & considers his attempt to combine existentialism & Marxism; (5) Robert B. Pippin—Marcuse on Hegel and Historicity—examines Marcuse's reaction to G. W. F. Hegel, particularly concerning the problems involved in incorporating history into critical analysis; & (6) Frederick Olafson—Heidegger's Politics: An Interview with Herbert Marcuse—transcript of an interview dealing with, among other things, the relation between Heidegger's philosophy & his later involvement with the Nazis. PART III - THE AESTHETIC DIMENSION - includes (7) Stephen Eric Bronner—Between Art and Utopia: Reconsidering the Aesthetic Theory of Herbert Marcuse—critically discusses the importance of art for informing the utopian element of Marcuse's critical theory. PART IV - THE PSYCHOLOGICAL DIMENSION - contains (8) Edward J. Hyman—Eros and Freedom: The Critical Psychology of Herbert Marcuse—examines Marcuse's modification & incorporation of a Freudian theory of instincts into his critical theory, & finds flaws in the theory of sublimation. PART V - THE POLITICAL DIMENSION - includes (9) Douglas Kellner—Herbert Marcuse's Reconstruction of Marxism—argues that Marcuse was neither an orthodox Marxist nor a non-Marxist, but rather, that he reconstructed Marxist theory during a time of crisis for it, & that he did so within the spirit of Marx; & (10) Richard Lichtman—Repressive Tolerance—analyzes John Stuart Mill's arguments for the liberal doctrine of freedom of speech & takes the contradictions therein as a basis for critically examining Marcuse's thoughts on tolerance & the necessity for intolerance in revolutionary situations. PART VI - THE TECHNOLOGICAL DIMENSION - contains (11) Claus Offe (Tr by Anne-Marie Feenberg)—Technology and One-Dimensionality: A Version of the Technocracy Thesis?—detects a kind of technological determinism & an affinity with conservative technocracy theories in Marcuse's diagnosis of the one-dimensionality of modern societies in which technology has become diffused; & (12) Andrew Feenberg—The Bias of Technology—seeks to clarify Marcuse's radical criticism that his critique does

1 A collection of essays based on papers delivered at an interdisciplinary round table held in Messina, Italy, in Nov 1980, seeking to clarify the concepts of alienation & anomie, to understand the evolution of these concepts since their use by Karl Marx & Emile Durkheim, & to investigate their manifestations in society today, in 8 Chpts with a Preface by Giacomo Barletta Caldarera & an Introduction by the editors. (1) David Schweitzer—Alienation, De-Alienation and Change: A Critical Overview of Current Perspectives in Philosophy and the Social Sciences—outlines the key issues in the debate on the meaning, usefulness, & relevancy of the concept of alienation, delineates some theoretical & methodological trends in philosophy, psychology, & sociology, & suggests some priorities for further work (in a revised version of SA 31:1/83M7303). (2) Richard Schacht—Doubts about Anomie and Anomia—points to problems in the formulation of the ideas of anomie & anomia & the relation between them, suggesting that the concepts tend to obscure more than they explain. (3) Joachim Israel—Alienation and Anomie: A Dialectical Approach—develops a dialectical methodology & considers the possibility of reconciling internal & external descriptions of anomie & alienation, a state of mind & a measurable object, by means of dialectics. (4) Melvin Seeman—A Prolegomenon on Empirical Research regarding Anomie—indicates how research on collective behavior may be relevant to discussions of anomie, & considers the central distinction between unclarity & rejection of goals on the one hand & unclarity & rejection of norms that govern the achievement of goals on the other. (5) Felix Geyer—A General Systems Approach to Psychiatric and Sociological De-Alienation—applies a systems analysis model to three types of alienation (psychological, sociological, & ontological) & to the possibilities &

A critical sociological examination of the subjective, social, & institutional aspects of health & health care, drawing on the perspective established by Michel Foucault in his studies of knowledge, power, & the evolution of institutions of social control, in IV PARTS & 11 Chpts. PART I - INTRODUCTION - includes (1) Medical Sociology—argues for orienting the sociology of medicine more around the central theoretical issues of sociology, reviews the history of the sociology of medicine, & discusses the work of Foucault; & (2) Religion and Medicine From Sin to Sickness—traces the secularization of medicine, emphasizing the use of diet & anatomy first by religion & later by secular medicine in social control of the body. PART II - CONCEPTS OF DISEASE AND SICKNESS - contains (3) On Being Sick—critically examines the social concept of the sick role developed by Talcott Parsons, emphasizing the factors of responsibility, individual autonomy, & degradation, (4) Madness and Civilization—considers the history of madness & the asylum through the perspective of Foucault, & examines the recent history of social policy toward the insane in terms of social exclusion & political control, (5) Women's Complaints: Patriarchy and Illness—discusses the regulation of the body as maintenance of social order in the context of the treatment of women's bodies, focusing on witchcraft, midwifery, hysteria, sexuality, patriarchal property, & population control, & (6) Aging, Dying and Death—examines changes in the social treatment of the elderly, arguing that the current dependency & stigmatization characteristics of aging qualify it as a form of the sick role. PART III - SOCIAL ORGANIZATION OF MEDICAL POWER - includes (7) Professions, Knowledge and Power—considers various theoretical traditions in the sociological analysis of the professions, suggesting a synthesis combining knowledge, power, & ethics as necessary dimensions of professionalism, & applies this perspective to the professions of nursing & pharmacy; (8) Medical Bureaucracies: The Hospital, the Clinic and Modern Society—discusses the role of hospitals in the extension of medical domination & the expansion of medical knowledge & its legitimacy; (9) Capitalism, Class and Illness—critically examines neo-Marxist & political-economy approaches to the relation between health & capitalism, suggesting the need to differentiate between different forms of capitalism, to understand the restructuring of SCs, & to recognize the changes brought about by privatization of key medical functions; & (10) Comparative Health Systems The Globalization of Medical Power—considers various classifications of health-care systems, differences in free-enterprise & state-socialist systems & features common to them, & notes global trends toward a widening of medical control & the medicalization of deviance under the common bureaucratic policing of society PART IV - CONCLUSION - contains (11) The Regulation of Bodies synthesizes the foregoing discussion, suggesting an alternative to the medical model of health, & considers the problems of citizen demands for health care vs social requirements of regulation 6 Tables, 4 Figures, 526 References.

the role of participation in organizational design for the purpose of promoting member commitment, & treats such issues as the social values used to guide a new organization, the impact of technology & the environment on the design process, & new requirements for effective management, (8) Eric Trist Intervention Strategies for Interorganizational Domains examines the phenomenon of metaproblems requiring interorganizational competence for their solution & proposes intervention strategies that allow interorganizational domains to develop along social processes rather than bureaucratic lines, (9) Max Eiden- Democratizing Organizations: A Challenge to Organization Development considers two examples of OD practice involving worker participation & posits some necessary conditions for democratizing organizations, (10) Jerry I. Porras & Joan Harkness Managing Planned Change: A Stream Approach proposes an approach for managing organizational change called "stream analysis," which tries to oversee all change actions, their interconnections, & their effects, & describes a practical application; & (11) Anthony P. Raia & Newton Margulies-Organizational Development: Issues, Trends, and Prospects provides a progress report on the current field of OD, including a look toward its future, based primarily on assessments in the professional literature. PART III - LEADERSHIP REALITIES AND DILEMMAS - includes (12) Will McWhinney The Realities of Leadership relates leadership styles to concepts of realities; (13) David M. Boje & David Ulrich-The Qualitative Side of Leadership discusses leader behaviors that shape the cultural fabric of organizations, & describes ways to use ethnographic concepts & behaviors to shape the qualitative side of leadership theory & practice, (14) Thomas C. Dandridge-Organizational Stories and Rituals considers the roles that myths & ritual play in the creation, maintenance, & guidance of an organization, & examines the work of the leader as manager of symbols; (15) Kenneth W. Thomas & Walter G. Tymon, Jr Structural Approaches to Conflict Management describes five modes in which leaders handle conflict within organizations & provides guides for when to use them, concluding that conflict can often be seen as an opportunity for the manager & the organization, (16) Abraham Kaplan Values in Decision Making examines the role of values in managerial decision making; & (17) William Gellermann Values and Ethical Issues for Human Systems Development Practitioners presents the primary ethical issues involved in professional practice in human systems development. PART IV - RESEARCH METHODS, NEW DEVELOPMENTS AND TRENDS - contains (18) Roger D. Evered-Transforming Managerial and Organizational Research: Creating a Science that Works-discusses the paucity of research results & attributes this problem to neglect in making theory & method relevant to the human condition; (19) Abraham Kaplan Understanding Method in the Study of People-examines problems of method inherent in the study of people, (20) Lee G. Cooper & Harold G. Levine Guerrilla Science: An Epistemology for the Applied Behavioral Sciences-describes an approach more appropriate to the study of human systems than methods developed in other fields, (21) Thomas G. International Review of Applied Linguistics in Language Teaching

ISSN 0019-042X

Editors: Prof. Dr. Bertil Malmberg, Lund; Prof. Dr. Gerhard Nickel, Stuttgart

Assistant Editor: Dr. Dietrich Nehls, Stuttgart

Since its foundation in 1963, IRAL has tried to reflect the worldwide upsurge of interest in speech communication and the rethinking of the premises of language teaching. The aim has been, and will continue to be, to provide a common meeting ground for researchers concerned with applied linguistics in its various forms.

IRAL is published quarterly. (February, May, August, November). Each annual volume contains an average of ca. 360 pages.

Subscription per volume	DM 140,- (Institutions)

Computers and Translation

Editor

Dr Sergei Nirenburg, Carnegie Mellon University, Center for Machine Translation, Pittsburgh, PA, USA

Computers and Translation publishes high-quality technical articles dealing, in a theoretical, descriptive or computational aspect, with every topic that contributes to the advance of machine translation and machine-aided translation. The following list, though by no means exhaustive, suggests the major fields of interest to Computers and Translation

- machine translation
- human-aided machine translation
- machine-aided human translation systems
- theory and methodology of translation
- natural language parsing – morphological, syntactic, semantic and pragmatic – as it pertains to machine translation
- natural language generation, as it pertains to machine translation
- all aspects of acquisition, representation and use of linguistic and encyclopedic knowledge for translation
- lexicographic support for translation, including machine-readable dictionaries
- machine translation as an application of theoretical linguistics theories of syntax, semantics and pragmatics, as they pertain to translation
- actual computationally relevant descriptions of various syntactic and semantic phenomena in particular languages, and, especially, comparative and contrastive linguistic studies of such phenomena in sets of languages
- machine translation as an application area of artificial intelligence
- sublanguages, restricted domains and machine translation
- data models and database management for machine translation
- computational system architectures for machine translation
- programming and knowledge representation languages useful for machine translation
- computational tools for machine translation
- human engineering aspects of machine translation systems (computing environments)
- organization, management and evaluation of machine translation projects

Contents:

- (1) Author Index lists all authors from the Main Section and Supplement abstracts.
- (2) Source Index lists all serials covered in the issue and, within each serial, the page numbers of the articles abstracted. All Supplement abstracts are listed under the appropriate association name.
- (3) Subject Index covers all Main Section and Supplement abstracts.
- (4) Accession numbers beginning with the letter S refer to abstracts of papers presented at association conferences; they are bound together as supplements following the issue's main section. Accession numbers beginning with uppercase letters other than S refer to abstracts of journal articles included in the issue.

AN INTERNATIONAL JOURNAL OF APPLIED LINGUISTICS

Editor: Waldemar Pfeiffer

Editorial Advisory Board:

Albert Bartoszewicz, Warszawa
Stanisław Gniadek, Poznań
Leon Kaczmarek, Lublin
Aleksander Szulc, Kraków

Jacek Fisiak, Poznań
Franciszek Grucza, Warszawa
Waldemar Marton, Poznań
Władysław Woźniewicz, Poznań

Glottodidactica is an annual publication of the Department of Glottodidactics at Adam Mickiewicz University, Poznań, Poland. The journal is primarily concerned with the theoretical issues in the field of applied linguistics that are related to language learning and language education. Within this framework the journal welcomes contributions from the various related disciplines such as psycholinguistics, sociolinguistics, and linguistics that may offer valuable insights into the problems of language learning and language teaching.

Glottodidactica is abstracted by such journals as: Language and Language Behavior Abstract (USA), Language Teaching and Linguistics: Abstracts (England) and Bibliographie Moderner Sprachunterricht (Germany). In addition, copies of the journal are found in all major centres for information on language teaching and research such as CILT (London) and Informationszentrum für Fremdsprachenforschung (Marburg).

Submissions are welcome from Poland and abroad. We accept articles and reviews in English, Russian, French and German. Non-native contributors are requested to have their typescripts checked by a native speaker.

Three copies of articles and/or reviews should be sent in typescript to the editor. Contributions should be typed in double-spacing on one side of the paper. Footnotes, references and tables should appear on separate sheets. A fifteen-line abstract in English must accompany each article regardless of the language used.

Correspondence on editorial matters should be addressed to: The Editor, Glottodidactica, Adam Mickiewicz University, Wieniawskiego 1, PL - 61-712 Poznań, Poland.

Correspondence about subscriptions and on advertising matters should be addressed to: Adam Mickiewicz University Press, Marchlewskiego 128, PL - 61-874 Poznań, Poland. Tel 699 221 ext. 161, telex 413260 UAM PL.
